DEAR SIR: I have been requested by the members of the Elgin congregation to consult you as to what steps, if any, it would be desirable to take in order to be placed on record officially in the various States where we have congregations as being opposed to doing military service on account of religious scruples.

While we understand that the General Staff's bill provides exemption from military service to certain sects, such as our own, whose creed forbids its members to participate in war, we, nevertheless, feel that because most of our people are of German and Swiss extraction (probably 75 per cent being native-born Americans) it would be best to make our position clear right at the commencement of war.

In explanation I wish to say that the official name of our church is "The German Apostolic Christian Church." However, in the central parts of Illinois we are probably better known as "The New Amish," while in other sections of the country we are better known under such names as "Swiss" and "Schwaben."

We would like to have it understood that we are thoroughly loyal to the Government of the United States, and that our opposition to war and military service is not influenced in the slightest degree by the fact that it is Germany who is now our enemy.

The members of our denomination have never taken up arms, either during the American wars or the wars of Europe. In the present great war our brethren in Europe—in Germany, Austria, and Hungary—have been granted exemption from doing military service in which the use of weapons is necessary.

I am inclosing a partial list of the names of the towns and cities in the United States in which our congregations are located.

Greatly appreciating your advice in this matter, and trusting that during these busy and trying days at Washington you will find sufficient time for an early reply, I am,

Very respectfully, yours,

WILLIAM STETTNER,
665 Lillie Street, Elgin, Ill.

P. S.—To make our position to you as clear as possible, wish to add that our belief rests entirely upon the Holy Scripture, which teaches us, "Thou shalt not kill."

We ask exemption from military service where it would be necessary to bear weapons.

We have congregations located at Elgin, Peoria, Gridley, Fairbury, Eureka, and Roanoke, Ill. Also a number in the rural districts. Also have a number of congregations in the following States: Iowa, Kansas, Ohio, New York, Connecticut, New Jersey, Minnesota, Indiana, Michigan, Oregon, and Oklahoma. I don't know the names of all the places where our congregations are located in these States, but will gladly get the names of the towns should you desire.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present an editorial from the Illinois Staats-Zeitung, a German newspaper of the city of Chicago. The editorial is of such a character, calling upon those of German birth to be loyal to the Government and to obey the laws, that I consider it important enough to ask that it be prined at length in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TO OUR READERS.

The Illinois Staats-Zeitung was established over 70 years ago and ever since has not missed a day of publication in this city. During its existence it never veered from its duty to advocate good citizenship and those principles that seemed to it to be for the welfare of the people of the United States and for the best interests of this country. The United States is its native land, and to that country alone the Illinois Staats-Zeitung has always proclaimed and acted allegiance and loyalty.

For the first time in its history the Illinois Staats-Zeitung is called upon to take part in a war between Germany and the United States. It does so now as a part of this great Republic and as one of its molders of public opinion. It is unequivocally upon the side of the United States. At no time did it champion German interests or the interests of any foreign country to the detriment or in preference to the interests of the United States, and it will never do so.

Before a state of war was declared by our Congress against Germany the Illinois Staats-Zeitung printed the German view of the war events of the day, and in that respect it was but one of many papers. It expressed its sympathy for Germany as against her numerous enemies abroad, but never against the United States. It proclaimed fair play for Germany. It sought to keep the United States from declaring war upon Germany at present, believing that the people did not want war. It repeatedly announced its determination to support any course our Congress decided upon.

Congress decided to declare a state of war against Germany. The Illinois Staats-Zeitung stands behind Congress and stands behind President Wilson.

That constitutes good citizenship. There is no other course possible for a patriotic publication.

It also constitutes good citizenship for the individual. In fact, it is the plain duty of every American.

The citizen may be sorry that this country is at war with Germany. The heart may be wrung with grief. His mind may not quite grasp the importance of the matter. But the citizen should be of a contented mind. Nothing can be done to alter the fact that the United States is at war with Germany. Much harm can befall the citizen who fails to grasp that fact.

The fact is that our country—the United States—has officially declared that Germany—the fatherland of millions of the people of the United States—is the enemy of the United States. It does not mitigate that fact to assume that we are at war with the German Government. The German people stand behind their Government and the American people—all of them—must and will stand behind the American Government.

Our people of Teutonic extraction will do so.

In no way whatever should any American give counsel or aid to our enemy. Neither by uttered or written words or by acts will Americans worthy of the name assist the enemies of our beloved Republic, nor venture to defend the words or acts of our enemies, unless, indeed, our American Government finds in them comfort, aid, or advantage for the United States. Good citizenship demands loyalty in thought as well as in words and acts. Personal safety suggests it. The interest of our country compels it. The Illinois Staats-Zeitung preaches it.

For the peace of the world it would be well if Germany rescinded her decision as to unrestricted and ruthless submarine warfare and ceased to sink unarmed merchantmen without warning and contrary to the established laws of nations. Prior to the War of 1812 France receded from her decrees of Berlin and Milan and thus avoided war with the United States. Were Germany to do as France did, perhaps the war between Germany and the United States would end. If that happened, then the soul-absorbing torment of millions of our citizens would end, too. Peace with honor to the United States might be concluded.

Meanwhile the war against Germany will be prosecuted with increasing vigor and skill and resources. The United States needs volunteers—men and women—for the service. Whether or not enough individuals volunteer, there will be universal compulsory military service enacted before many weeks elapse. Under compulsion all young men of certain ages and physical condition will be drafted into the service.

It will cast more credit and honor upon every young man to enlist as a volunteer rather than wait to be drafted.

The Illinois Staats-Zeitung is prepared to receive names and addresses of young men who will enlist and obtain information for them as to any branch of the service, and will forward all such names and addresses to the proper Government officials.

Mr. LODGE presented resolutions of the Freemen's Forum of Massachusetts, supporting the Government in the war with Germany and urging national prohibition as a war measure, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUTHERLAND presented telegrams from sundry citizens of Elkins, Wellsburg, Beckley, Grafton, and Weston; of Lodge No. 411, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, of Morgantown; and of the Ohio County Medical Society, of Wheeling, all in the State of West Virginia, pledging support to the President, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions from the Chamber of Commerce of Ronceverte; from E. H. Vickers, of the West Virginia University, Morgantown; the Board of Trade of Spencer; of Clarksburg Camp, Sons of Veterans; of the Chamber of Commerce of Bluefield; of J. G. Caldwell Post, No. 21, Department of West Virginia, Grand Army of the Republic, of Moundsville; of the Board of Commerce, of Parkersburg; of Kanawha Camp, No. 2, United Spanish War Veterans, of Charleston; of Charleston Lodge, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks; of Local Lodge No. 153, Knights of Pythias, of Bluefield; of Local Lodge No. 204, Knights of Pythias, of Beaver; and of sundry citizens of Lewisburg, Welch, and St. Marys, all in the State of West Virginia, pledging support to the President, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WEEKS. I send to the desk a statement on the subject of universal military training, signed by the president of Harvard University, the president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the president of Boston College, and one other president of a college. I ask to have the statement read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the statement was read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

APRIL 3, 1917.

We, the undersigned, would not put the slightest obstacle in the way of thorough and adequate training of every citizen for duties which his country may require of him. We would, however, call the attention of Congress to the fact that young men at a given age are not equally mature, and that therefore the requirement of one period of many months of continuous service after a particular birthday would cause needless hardship.

We therefore urge that several years' option be given each individual, so that his training may come at some desirable stage in his education or occupation.

We would also recommend, if possible, a division of continuous training into periods of, say, three months, connected and continued by such instruction as may be deemed wise, since there will be thereby not only a saving to the Government but, as many occupations have three-month periods of slack work, a valuable adaptation to individual conditions.

A. LAWRENCE LOWELL.
RICHARD E. MACLAURIN.
L. H. MURLIN.
HERMON C. BUMPUS.

Mr. WEEKS presented petitions of the Republican Club of Massachusetts, pledging support to the President, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (for Mr. LANE) presented memorials of sundry citizens of Oregon, remonstrating against compulsory military training, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WATSON submitted sundry papers to accompany the bill (S. 382) for providing a system of national defense based upon universal liability to military training and service, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I present a telegram from the Patriotic League of Colfax, Wash., and a petition of sundry citizens of Walla Walla, Wash., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the telegram and petitions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COLFAX, WASH., April 8, 1917.

Hon. MILES POINDEXTER,
Washington, D. C.:

The Colfax Patriotic League extends hearty congratulations to you for your attitude and vote on the recent war resolution passed by Congress. In public mass meeting here to-day over 1,000 citizens unanimously indorsed the action taken by Congress and the President.

B. F. MANRING,
President Colfax Patriotic League.
S. E. RATLIFF,
Secretary.

Resolutions.

The citizens of Walla Walla and adjoining communities, assembled in mass meeting March 31, 1917, recognizing the existence of a momentous crisis in the life of the world and the probability that the course of the German Government will force our country to take part in the world war, give expression to our sentiments in these resolutions:

"That we reaffirm our fealty to those ideals of freedom, equality, and humanity which came into being with the birth of our Nation, and which, marching under the leadership of our sacred Stars and Stripes, have brought hope and ambition and advancement to all men, and that we avow our determination to defend them by peace if possible, by war if necessary.

"That we denounce the lawless and inhuman attacks on our citizens and those of other neutral countries on the high seas as a challenge to the continuance of those very ideals for which our fathers lived and died.

OBLIGATIONS ACKNOWLEDGED.

"That we recognize the present war as fundamentally a combat to the death between military despotism on the one side and free government on the other, and that we acknowledge as a logical consequence the obligation upon America to preserve not alone her own honor and her own flag from stain or defilement, but to help sustain the vital cause of popular liberty throughout the world.

"That we interpret the tremendous overturnings in Europe, and particularly the revolution in Russia, as the forerunner of changes whereby there shall become established throughout the world that genuine ideal of government of the people, by the people, and for the people, which has been the inspiration of the greatest souls in our history.

ALLEGIANCE PLEDGED.

"That in this crisis we declare the indispensable necessity of maintaining one citizenship, one allegiance, and one flag, and that we will not tolerate disloyalty on the part of any residents within our limits, and yet, while thus demanding undivided allegiance, we wish to recognize the true worth of the many citizens of German birth, who have gained our deepest regard by years of residence with us, and we therefore express our belief that the great majority of these foreign-born Americans are genuine patriots, who will contribute of their substance and lives to maintain a country as dear to them by adoption as to the majority of us by birth, and we wish, therefore, in the spirit of true fraternity, to call upon all such to rally with us around a common cause.

MORE GARDENS URGED.

"Be it further

"Resolved, as especially applicable to our local conditions—

"First. That inasmuch as the future may call for vast expenditures and consequent economics such as we in this land of plenty are little accustomed to, we recommend to city and school authorities that they undertake a systematic utilization of vacant lots and tracts around the towns for gardening purposes by boys and girls, to the end that the young people may secure lessons in frugality and industry, as well as means, both for practical support and for money, which may be used for contributing to relief work for the starving people of Europe.

"Second. That we urge upon our citizens to assist in every way the noble work undertaken by the Red Cross and other relief organizations.

THE PECUNIARY BURDENS.

"Third. That while we urge our young men to join the State guard or the National Army, we should not forget that it is oftentimes a great sacrifice for men to leave business careers and dependent families for the meager pittance of a soldier's pay, and that it is therefore a duty upon the community and Government to assist needy families thus left, as well as an obligation on the Government to increase largely the wages of soldiers, for surely men who offer time and life to the service of their country have the right to expect those who remain at home to bear the pecuniary burdens.

"In conclusion, we, representatives of this large section of southeastern Washington, recognizing our obligations as inheritors of a sacred legacy of service and sacrifice from the fathers of America, our duty to the world, and our reverent faith in the Divine Providence whose hand has been manifest in our history, do hereby pledge to our President and our Congress the loyal support of our hands, our resources, and our lives."

CONSERVATION OF FOOD SUPPLIES.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, on April 10 the National Agricultural Society held a convention in the city of Washington, and during that convention adopted certain resolutions in respect to the conservation of food supplies in the United States. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the National Agricultural Society at agricultural mobilization convention, Washington, D. C., April 10, 1917.

Whereas the United States of America is entering upon a war practically without a food reserve; and

Whereas the state of war is upon us at the very opening of the crop season, and an emergency exists; and

Whereas the limiting element of food production is labor on the farm, and disregarding military enlistment the labor supply was never so short as now, and indiscriminate enlistment from the farms with no plan for labor replacement will reduce food production below the level of absolute need; and

Whereas if an adequate food supply is to be assured, the plan for public defense must include provision for food production as definite as for service at the front: Therefore be it

Resolved, That enlistment for active service in the field should be so regulated as not to interfere unduly with the necessary supply of labor on the farm; and be it further

Resolved, That we recommend the establishment in each State of a State council of defense that will cooperate with the existing national council of defense in the mobilization of the civilian resources of the State and Nation; and be it further

Resolved, That it is the sense of this body that suitable legislation be immediately enacted creating a Federal food commission which shall have authority and power to supervise, direct, and control the marketing and distributing of all food and clothing supplies, including specifically the right to take such action as shall be necessary, including the establishment of minimum prices, to protect the farmer and guarantee him against loss by reason of the increased production to which he is being urged; and be it further

Resolved, That it is the judgment of the advisory board of the National Agricultural Society that this is not the time in which to experiment with new and untried crops and processes. The American farmer should be encouraged to devote his principal efforts to the production of such crops and the employment of such methods as are well established in his community and as are likely to yield the maximum return in food or clothing material; and be it further

Resolved, That there is yet time in which to increase substantially the bread supply of the Nation by enlarging the area sown to spring wheat in those regions where this crop has proved to be staple. Attention is also called to the fact that we are milling our wheat wastefully, and that the flour produced by the normal wheat crop of the United States may be increased one-twelfth, or approximately 18,000,000 barrels, by milling on the basis of 81 per cent flour instead of 73 per cent flour as at present; and be it further

Resolved, That an important increase in our food supply may be made by enlarging the area planted to navy beans in the North and West and to Mexican and Topary beans in the Southwest by stimulating in every reasonable way an increase in the area of potatoes planted and of such crops as may be used for bread substitutes; and be it further

Resolved, That there is yet time in which to enlarge substantially the area planted to corn and cotton, America's two most important crops, and that by the use of manures and fertilizers and more intensive methods of cultivation the production may be greatly increased. With a corn production above normal it will be possible greatly to increase our livestock products. It will be possible under such circumstances to double poultry production within a year, to increase the milk production from one-fourth to one-third by the more liberal and intelligent feeding of the cows now being milked and to increase the pork production substantially through fall litters and through better methods of care and feeding; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge as a patriotic duty as well as an economic advantage at present prices increasing the numbers and improving the quality of breeding animals on the farms; and be it further

Resolved, That every effort be made to encourage the development of the gardening movement both in town and country and the preservation of the surplus by canning or proper storage; and be it further

Resolved, That special effort be made to use every feasible method of controlling and preventing injury to crops and animals by disease and insect pest; and be it further

Resolved, That as the production of sheep and wool in the United States has been steadily decreasing for several years past, and since the production of wool in 1916 was approximately only 285,000,000 pounds, while the normal quantity needed for manufacturing annually is over 600,000,000 pounds, and whereas the rapid decrease in the number of sheep is largely due to the destruction of sheep by dogs, that we recommend to the different State governments that adequate dog laws be enacted for the protection of the sheep industry; and be it further

Resolved, That so far as possible everyone be urged to refrain until after the planting season and during the harvesting season from making improvements which will require labor which should be employed on the farms; and be it further

Resolved, That the agricultural colleges be urged to put into immediate effect such arrangements as will make the members of their classes available for the planting of the present year; and be it further

Resolved, That the banks be urged to extend to farmers such reasonable credit as may be needed to increase crop production.

JURISDICTION OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for a change of reference. Several days ago I introduced the bill (S. 83) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims in certain cases. At the last session of Congress this bill was considered by the Judiciary Committee, was reported favorably, and passed, but failed of action in the other House in the closing days of the Congress. When introduced at this session it was referred to the Committee on Claims. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which considered it during the last Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

WASHINGTON RAILWAY & ELECTRIC CO.

Mr. THOMPSON. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back Senate resolution 23 and submit a report (No. 7) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 23), as follows:

Whereas differences have arisen between the Washington Railway & Electric Co. (a street railway corporation in the District of Columbia, created and existing by virtue of the act of Congress approved June 5, 1900) and certain of its employees, by reason of which said employees declared a strike or "walkout" on Monday March 12, 1917, and withdrew from the service of the company; and

Whereas the failure of the said street railway company and its employees to settle and adjust their differences has caused and is causing great public inconvenience and loss; and

Whereas it is in the interest of the public safety and welfare that the causes of the existing differences between the Washington Railway & Electric Co. and its employees should be ascertained and a means devised, if possible, whereby the same may be justly accommodated: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, who are hereby given full authority to investigate the cause or causes which have occasioned the present strike by the said employees of the Washington Railway & Electric Co., and to report the result of its investigation, with such recommendations as it may deem proper to make, to the Senate at the earliest possible day, and the said committee or subcommittee thereof is hereby given power and authority to summon witnesses, administer oaths, and take testimony under oath as to all matters and things covered by this resolution and to employ such clerical and stenographic assistance as may be necessary in the premises, the expenses of said committee to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. THOMPSON. The report accompanying the resolution is short, and I ask that it be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred Senate resolution No. 23, authorize the expenditure of the money for the investigation provided for in the resolution, but report the resolution back to the Senate for reference to the proper committee.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I am going to make the point of order that the committee has no power to direct the reference of the resolution. This resolution was sent to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate under the statute which requires that every resolution of that character which calls for the expenditure of money shall be scrutinized and sanctioned, or scrutinized and not sanctioned, by that committee. They have discharged their full duty when they authorize the expenditure of the money. The resolution is now before the Senate for action. I presume under the rule, however, it will go over on objection for one day; but I first want it understood that I make the point that the committee is going far beyond its jurisdiction when it suggests to the Senate, or to the presiding officer of the Senate, that a resolution should be referred. Matters of reference are settled here. Motions with regard to reference are made here.

Pending a decision of that motion, I am going to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if this resolution, when offered, could have been referred to the appropriate committee to consider the subject matter of the resolution, it would have been referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. That committee has the subject matter of the resolution under its jurisdiction; but it could not go to that committee for consideration until it had been referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and it was, of course, properly referred by the presiding officer.

Mr. HUGHES. I am not complaining about that.

Mr. SMOOT. The statute provides that—

Hereafter no payment shall be made from the contingent fund of the Senate unless sanctioned by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, or from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives unless sanctioned by the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate for the purpose of having that committee sanction the expenditure of the money necessary to conduct the investigation if a committee of the Senate or the Senate itself should decide to make the investigation. Mr. President, this same course has been followed time and time again since I have been a Member of this body.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption, I should like to have him indicate a case where it has been done. I know that the Senator's own committee—I examined the records and minutes of the committee this morning—has refused to do the very thing that he has succeeded in having this committee do in reference to this case. The Senator is as familiar with those precedents as I am, but whether the committee attempts to usurp that jurisdiction or not makes not the slightest difference to me. It goes beyond its province when it suggests a reference to any committee. It is charged with the duty of deciding whether or not this is a proper expenditure of money. When it decides that, its functions are ended as the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The Senate itself is perfectly capable, without direction from the Senator or the committee of which the Senator is a member, of deciding whether there shall be a reference of this resolution to a committee, or whether it shall act upon it at once. The Senator knows that, of course, as well as I do.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator asks me to name an instance where the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate have simply reported back to the Senate sanctioning the expense that may be incurred on account of the investigation. I want to say to him that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] introduced here a resolution in reference to an investigation of certain questions involved in the interstate-commerce law. He wanted an investigation. That matter was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate because it involved the payment of moneys out of the contingent fund of the Senate. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate reported to the Senate that they sanctioned the expenditure necessary to carry on the investigation, and it was immediately referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce for that committee to decide the advisability of entering upon the investigation.

Mr. HUGHES. Because that committee was to make the investigation.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; only a part of the committee was to make the investigation. The members of the committee were to be named. A part of the committee from the House and a part from the Senate were to make the investigation, if authorized.

Mr. HUGHES. Exactly. It was perfectly proper, although it was no part of the duty of the committee to make any recommendation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the report made by the committee this morning simply sanctions or authorizes the payment of the expense, whatever it may be, attached to this investigation, if the investigation is made, and asks that the resolution be referred to the proper committee. The presiding officer can decide as to what committee that may be, and of course the subject matter is under the jurisdiction of the Committee on the District of Columbia. There is no question in my mind that it is perfectly regular.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not think the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate can bind the action of the Senate at all on a question of that kind.

Mr. SMOOT. No; nor do I suggest such a thing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The recommendation is not doing any harm, and it is not doing any good that the Chair can see, unless the Senate carries it out.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am not very familiar with the procedure of the Senate; but it seems to me that a resolution of this character should have been referred first to a committee to determine whether or not the investigation should be entered upon. Certainly it was not in contemplation that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate should pass upon the advisability of such an investigation as this, and the language of the statute governing such matters seems to imply just that. It uses the word "sanction," evidently contemplating that the merits of such a proposition shall first be investigated by some other committee, and then the matter shall be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate so that it may sanction the expenditure, provided such expenditure is first deemed necessary.

I think the resolution in the first instance should have been referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia or some other appropriate committee, and that committee should have determined whether or not it was advisable to have the investigation made; and if it determined in the affirmative, then the resolution should have been referred to the committee simply to investigate the status of the fund to determine whether or not the fund would stand it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it has been the almost universal custom of the Senate that when the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate reports covering the point of there being sufficient money in the contingent fund to warrant an investigation, if it is a question of moment, of substance, then the matter goes to the proper committee for consideration. If the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate reports upon a mere resolution paying money to the family of a dead employee, for instance, that concludes the matter; but in all questions such as this—and this is a very important matter—there is no question that it ought to go to the proper standing committee for consideration and report. I trust, therefore, that will be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is not this the situation: This is a Senate resolution. It comes back with a report from the committee, with a recommendation that the Chair does not think either helps or harms any. It can be taken up by unanimous consent and agreed to without going to the committee, or it can lie over a day if there is objection, or any Member of the Senate has a right to move to refer it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly. Then, Mr. President, I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that motion is in order.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, that motion is debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks not. He will see in a minute, but he thinks not.

Mr. HUGHES. Well, I will not attempt to debate it, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At this time the Chair does not think the motion is debatable.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I will not attempt to debate it, but I will ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to refer the resolution. I think everybody understands the situation and what is going on here, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I do not see him in his seat, so I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when Mr. GOFF'S name was called). I desire to state that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is detained at home by illness.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when Mr. LANE'S name was called). I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. LANE] is ill. I wish to have this announcement stand for the day. I also desire to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] has been called out of the Senate on official business.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is absent. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and vote "yea."

Mr. BRADY (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN]. I observe that that Senator is absent from the Chamber, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the affirmative). I note that the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has not voted. Because of a general pair with him I am obliged to withdraw my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I notice that the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has not voted. Having a general pair with him I withdraw my vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is necessarily absent on public business.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is unavoidably detained by illness.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 36, as follows:

CROW INDIAN RESERVATION, MONT.

Mr. WALSH submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 30), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be requested to transmit to the Senate information as to whether and what part of the land within the Crow Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, is susceptible of cultivation to cereal crops without irrigation; what amount of wheat or other breadstuffs could be raised thereon; and what addition to the annual food supply of the Nation would be secured, if the said reservation were opened to settlement.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE.

Mr. GORE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 31), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fifth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers; to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page; to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expense thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

EXPORTS TO NEUTRAL COUNTRIES.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 32), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce be, and is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate a statement of the exports from the United States to the neutral countries of Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, and Switzerland since the opening of the European war in August, 1914; that said statement include specifications as to the quantity, value, and classification of said exports; and that the Secretary of Commerce be, and is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate a statement of the same scope and specifications covering exports from the United States to said neutral countries for the period of two years prior to August 1, 1914; also that the Secretary of Commerce be requested to furnish such data as may be available to him bearing upon the question as to what proportion of the exports to such neutral countries during the period of said war found their way into Germany or Austria-Hungary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Before the resolution is acted upon——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York was recognized.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator address himself to this resolution?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I expect to do so, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. Very well; I thought the Senator rose for another purpose.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I simply desire to ask the author of the resolution if he will explain its object at this particular time? I am impressed with the idea that the executive departments are overrun with work. The resolution apparently calls for a great mass of information. I would like before consent to its immediate consideration is given to understand the reason for its presentation at this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to look into this matter, and I ask that the resolution may go over under the rule.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to its going over under the rule.

Mr. STONE. I will state what I desired to say. I do not wish to address myself to the merits of the resolution; but the resolution as I caught it is in the form of a request to the Secretary of Commerce to furnish such information. The form is that the Secretary be directed to do so, and I think that form is important and ought to be followed.

Mr. JAMES. If not incompatible with the public interest?

Mr. STONE. It does not go to the Secretary to decide whether it is incompatible with the public interest; it goes to the President to decide whether it is incompatible; but the heads of departments are directed to furnish information, and not requested to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it go over.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have no objection to the resolution going over, or to its reference, but the importance of the information desired it seems to me must be obvious to the Senate at this time. I will say now that I purpose having this information to introduce at the earliest possible date for consideration a bill placing an embargo upon exports to neutral countries where it is apparent that the goods, merchandise, or property exported to those countries find their way into Germany and are an aid to Germany in the prosecution of the war against the allies and against this country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE COMMITTEE.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], who has been called away on account of illness, be excused from serving as one of the conferees on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the general deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 12), and that the Chair appoint the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the vacancy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair appoints the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] in the place of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be until 12 o'clock on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL CAPITOL POLICE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 28) authorizing the temporary employment of additional policemen for the Capitol Building and Grounds and the Senate and House Office Buildings, returned from the House of Representatives in compliance with the request of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move to reconsider the votes by which the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading and passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed, inasmuch as a joint resolution of the same character has passed the Senate and awaits the action of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 2 hours and 25 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 16, 1917, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 13, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite and eternal Spirit, from whom all things proceed, we are finite; Thou art infinite. We are weak; Thou art almighty. Our knowledge is limited; Thou art omniscient. The past, present, and future are as an open book to Thee. We pray for increased wisdom, strength, and courage; that we may meet the great responsibility forced upon us, with calm deliberation and an earnest determination to do the right as it is given us to see the right; that out of the world-wide holocaust may come a brighter day when men shall learn war no more, and liberty, justice, and peace shall reign supreme, to the glory and honor of Thy holy Name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, April 11, was read and approved.

PRINTING OF DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] rise?

Mr. FOSTER. At about the close of the last session of Congress permission was granted to print the diplomatic correspondence, and so forth, in reference to the war. Now, I would like to ask unanimous consent to add to that the President's message, the war resolution, and the proclamation of the President.

Mr. MANN. That is for the purpose of bringing it down to date?

Mr. FOSTER. For bringing it down to date.

Mr. MANN. Along with the matter largely submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Reserving the right to object, what is included in the previous request?

Mr. FOSTER. All of that correspondence——

Mr. BORLAND. Between our Government and the Imperial Government of Germany?

Mr. FOSTER. There is a lot of other correspondence with it.

Mr. MANN. Does that include the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. FOSTER. It is a compilation gotten up by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ODD FELLOWS' BUILDING, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a statement relative to the amendment of the act of June 29, 1916, for the purpose of constructing an Odd Fellows' building in the District of Columbia. There is a bill pending now, which I have introduced, for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. I did not hear the gentleman's request.

Mr. RAKER. It is for the purpose of amending the act of June 29, 1916, so as to permit the Odd Fellows' organization of the District of Columbia to build a new hall.

Mr. MANN. What is the object of inserting it in the RECORD?

Mr. RAKER. It is for the purpose of getting the information to the Members so that they may at an early date hope to get it up by unanimous consent, as they have made all their contracts and made all arrangements to go ahead. The title company will not complete the contract unless the bill is enacted so as to clear the title beyond any question.

Mr. MANN. Has the bill been reported by the committee?

Mr. RAKER. The committee is not completed yet. It is the idea to get this statement in so that the Members may see the necessity for it.

Mr. MANN. I think it should be presented to the committee.

Mr. RAKER. The committees have not been appointed yet.

Mr. MANN. It should not be acted upon without a report from the committee. However, I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the statement referred to:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 12, 1917.

Hon. J. E. RAKER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR JUDGE RAKER: Referring to the bill to amend an act approved June 29, 1906, entitled "An act to authorize the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia to sell, hold, and convey certain real estate," discussed with you and Congressman JOHNSON, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the following is a statement of the reasons for the passage of the bill:

The property known as Odd Fellows' Hall, on the east side of Seventh Street, between D and E Streets NW., is owned by eight of the Odd Fellow organizations of the District in different interests, proportioned in accordance with the amounts contributed by each for the original purchase, and the title is held by the Grand Lodge, Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia, a corporation, in trust for these several organizations.

The grand lodge itself is the owner of a large interest in the property. Recently all of the organizations interested have, by formal resolution, decided to raze the building now on the ground and erect a seven-story building, the first five floors and basement of which have been leased to an old-established business concern for a store, and the two upper floors of which are to be fitted up for the uses of the order in the District.

The contract for the building has been let to the George A. Fuller Co., and the deal made with the Washington Loan & Trust Co. and other trust companies associated therewith to finance the building project.

We have agreed to turn the building over to the contractor on May 1, and the contractor has let the contract for wrecking the old building, the work to be started on that date.

In having the papers prepared for the loan the title company raises the question as to whether or not, under the act of June 29, 1906, we can properly proceed as agreed upon.

The act of June 29, 1906, was passed by Congress at our request, to enable us to sell the old property and build a new building on another site with the proceeds of the sale. At that time we believed this plan was to go through, and the Congress readily passed the act on our request. The plan then in contemplation was not carried through, and now the title company questions whether or not the words "so to be purchased," in section 2 of the act of June 29, 1906, do not limit our right to encumber the ground to such ground as might be purchased by the proceeds of the sale of the present property instead of giving us the right to encumber the present property as well as any other property we might purchase. The title company suggests that in order to remove any doubt respecting this question we should have the act amended as provided in the proposed bill above referred to.

Every organization owning an interest in the property has joined, by formal resolution, in approval of the present plan for building the new building, and the grand lodge has authorized and instructed the grand master and the grand secretary to execute all papers required to carry the proposition through. Everything is, therefore, progressing to the end desired, and we only need to have this doubt cleared up in order to enable us to proceed.

As all of the plans and contracts have been let under the provision that the work shall start on May 1, I trust that unanimous consent for the passage of this bill may be obtained. We appreciate very much your kind offer to assist, and the assurance of Congressman JOHNSON to aid us in securing the prompt passage of the bill.

With kindest personal regards, I remain,

Sincerely and fraternally, yours,

E. W. BRADFORD,
Chairman of Building Committee and Representing Board of Trustees I. O. O. F. Hall.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following order:

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the Senate do now adjourn.

And that in compliance with the foregoing resolutions the Vice President had appointed, under the second resolution, as the committee on the part of the Senate Mr. GRONNA, Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. KENYON, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. JONES of New Mexico, Mr. HUSTING, Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. BROUSSARD, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, and Mr. FERNALD.

The message also announced that the President had approved and signed joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 1. Joint resolution declaring that a state of war exists between the Imperial German Government and the Government and the people of the United States, and making provision to prosecute the same.

ATTITUDE OF AMERICAN LABOR IN WAR AND PEACE.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a statement on the attitude of American labor in war and peace.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a statement on the attitude of American labor in war and peace. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 13, the Army appropriation bill, for the purpose of moving to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference. I will state that I do not see the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] here to-day, but he and I had an agreement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 13, the Army appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. That is the military appropriation bill?

Mr. DENT. That is the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Mr. DENT, Mr. FIELDS, Mr. QUIN, Mr. KAHN, and Mr. ANTHONY.

PRINTING OF DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reverting for a moment to the matter of the document that has been ordered printed by unanimous consent, the compilation made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], I understand that under the order there will be only about 1,300 copies printed. I think there ought to be more copies than that. I can not give a cost estimate, so I will not be able to answer any questions as to the cost.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that the Committee on Printing might properly report a resolution, if some one will introduce it, providing for additional copies.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The matter is now in print, so I am informed, and the proofs are in the hands of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], and the sooner we have them printed the sooner we will get the benefit of this document. I do not hesitate myself to take the responsibility of asking unanimous consent that 10,000 copies be printed of this document.

Mr. MANN. I think it ought to come from the Committee on Printing, I will say to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing certain telegrams from Colorado relative to a very important matter of legislation that is pending here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Upon what subject, Mr. Speaker? Over here we can not hear the nature of the gentleman's request.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. On the subject of military preparedness and compulsory military service.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, if I understood correctly a moment ago, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] asked unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD along the same line and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] objected. Now, it seems to me that if objection is going to be made to one gentleman extending his remarks in the RECORD, there should be some understanding as to what the policy will be.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the telegrams referred to:

COLORADO SPRINGS, COLO., April 9, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES B. TIMBERLAKE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

We have been surprised to learn that you have some doubt as to the wisdom of universal military service. Believing as we do not only that this is the fair way of recruiting an army, but is, in fact, the only way which will prove effective, we urge you to back the President in his recommendation for universal service, not only with your vote but with your influence, as nothing could be more humiliating at this time than to attempt to raise an army by the volunteer system and fail. We are now at war and believe that such being the case only the most effective and far-reaching methods should be employed. In sending this telegram we believe we voice the sentiments of a vast majority of this community.

EVENING TELEGRAPH.

EVENING TELEGRAPH,
Colorado Springs, Colo.:

Your telegram received asking for my position on universal military service bill. I am and have always been in favor of universal military training, and generally opposed to the draft in raising an army except where volunteer service has failed to meet conditions. That in this war it may be necessary to enter into some form of selective conscription, the outlines of which have not been presented for consideration, I have no doubt. I do not desire to declare myself favoring any pending legislation until fully acquainted with exact provisions. I want to assure you, however, that having supported the war resolution I shall support such legislation as may be deemed necessary for the vigorous prosecution of the war to a successful and speedy termination, believing in this course I will reflect the patriotic sentiment of my constituents.

CHARLES B. TIMBERLAKE.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I renew the request I made a moment ago, to extend my remarks in the RECORD as indicated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COMSTOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting resolutions passed by the authorities of Perdue University, and letters by men and boys in the Friends' School in Indiana, respecting the military bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a lot of resolutions, letters, and telegrams.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What are they about?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York inquires what they are about.

Mr. COMSTOCK. They are in reference to the military-training bill, and two or three resolutions have been adopted by organizations of the Society of Friends, who, of course, are opposed to war, but asking in the event that the bill for universal military training be passed there be an exemption from service of those who entertain that belief.

The SPEAKER. They are letters and telegrams concerning the bill for universal military service, and asking exemption of Friends in case of a draft.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object. We can not print all of those letters.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an article by the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture upon the shortage of the food supply.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EMERGENCY BOND ISSUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 2762, to authorize an issue of bonds to meet the expenditures for the national security and defense, and to extend credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider House bill 2762. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2762, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2762, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2762) to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and to extend credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, in presenting this bill we take the first step in financing the biggest, most momentous enterprise ever undertaken by the Government of the United States.

This bill contains the largest authorization of bond issues ever contained in any bill presented to any legislative body in the history of the world. I am happy to report that this bill has a unanimous approval and indorsement, and has the unanimous vote of the entire membership—Republican, Democratic, and Progressive—of the Ways and Means Committee. [Applause.]

The terms of the bill are simple. We provide for the issuance of $5,000,000,000 of bonds and an additional issue of $2,000,000,000 of one-year certificates of indebtedness. The terms and conditions of the bonds—that is, as to the maturity, the payment, the denomination, and all terms and conditions—are left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury and the President, except that they must bear interest at not more than 3½ per cent per annum and do not possess the circulation privilege. The proceeds from the sale of $3,000,000,000 worth of these bonds are to be used by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, in their discretion, to loan to foreign Governments in war with the Imperial German Government. In other words, the bill provides that this Government, through the Secretary of the Treasury and the President, can purchase of foreign Governments their bonds, not to exceed $3,000,000,000, but such bonds must have the same terms and conditions, the same rate of interest, the same maturity, and all other conditions as the bonds of the United States have.

It is provided further that if, before December 31, 1918, Congress should authorize an issue of bonds with a greater rate of interest than 3½ per cent, then the Secretary of the Treasury, at the option of the holder, can convert the bonds already issued under this act into bonds bearing a higher rate of interest.

It is provided further that the bonds of the foreign Governments which we buy with the $3,000,000,000 must also have those conditions; that is, that they must also be convertible into obligations bearing the higher rate of interest if we increase the rate of interest on our bonds in order to make them more salable.

Two billion dollars of the proceeds of this five billion dollar bond issue will be used by our Government for itself in the prosecution of the war.

The $2,000,000,000 of certificates authorized to be issued, bearing interest at a rate not to exceed 3½ per cent, are payable within one year from the date of issue, but they can never exceed, or there can never be outstanding, an amount in excess of $2,000,000,000. This is made necessary for the reason that the Government must have the money with which to prosecute the war, and taxes will not be available within perhaps a year; a sufficient amount of taxes will not be available within perhaps 18 months or 2 years, and therefore this issue of bonds becomes necessary.

Another provision in the bill is that the bonds already authorized for the construction of the Panama Canal and available to be issued, amounting to $222,000,000, and for the shipping act, amounting to $50,000,000, and for the nitrate plant, the Danish West Indies, and the Alaskan Railway, and the $150,000,000 worth of bonds that we authorized on the last day on which we met before the adjournment of the last Congress, and also the bonds to meet the Mexican situation, amounting to about $162,000,000 already authorized, shall bear when issued interest at the rate of 3½ per cent, the same as these other bonds. The interest rate was 3 per cent in the original acts.

Mr. MADDEN. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. It is proposed that these bonds shall bear 3½ per cent interest, and if new bonds are found to be necessary at a higher rate of interest, that the interest rate on these bonds shall be increased.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Have we the power to legislate to bind the European nations, whose bonds we take, to issue new bonds at the higher rates of interest that we shall have to pay?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think we have the power to bind them, but it provides that the Secretary of the Treasury and the President shall make arrangements with the Governments whose bonds we buy, so that, if we have to increase the rate of interest, they will be likewise obligated to increase the interest rate of their bonds to the same rate of interest that our bonds will bear.

Mr. MADDEN. The bonds of the allies are selling below par——

Mr. KITCHIN. I will answer the gentleman. We have to trust the Governments to whom we loan the money, for the reason that we have no power to legislate for them nor have we any power to make them pay for the bonds, even at 2 per cent, or at 5 per cent, or at 8 per cent. We have to trust them, of course.

Mr. MADDEN. I am asking for information only.

Mr. KITCHIN. I know that.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not trying to embarrass the gentleman.

Mr. KITCHIN. Not a bit. I will not let the gentleman embarrass me.

Mr. MADDEN. We have about $700,000,000 of bonds already issued, which are held by the national banks of the United States on deposit for circulation, which bonds bear 2 per cent interest. What effect will the issuance of these 3½ per cent bonds have on the value of the 2 per cent bonds held by the national banks?

Mr. KITCHIN. It will have no effect at all, because the value of those bonds is based, of course, upon their circulation privilege. These bonds which we are now proposing to issue will not have the circulation privilege. If they were to have the circulation privilege, of course, there being so many on the market, and there being so many other bonds held which would be in competition with the bonds having the circulation privilege, this bond issue would reduce the value of the 2 per cent bonds.

Mr. MADDEN. The bonds issued by the allies are selling below par. Is it proposed that we shall take those bonds at par in exchange for our bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is the proposition.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me we ought not to appropriate money out of the Federal Treasury to take bonds selling below par and pay par for those bonds.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it not true that it is not contemplated that bonds now issued by the Governments of the allies and now owned by individuals are to be taken by us, but that what is contemplated is that bonds from the allied Governments, with terms similar to those of ours, shall be taken to such extent, not exceeding $3,000,000,000, as in the discretion of the President may seem proper?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is correct. The bonds will be purchased from the foreign Governments, not from individuals. There is not to-day in existence a bond of any foreign Government that meets the terms of the bonds provided for in this bill which we must buy.

Mr. MADDEN. The mere fact that new bonds are to be issued by the Governments of Europe, to be exchanged for the bonds issued by the Government of the United States, will be no evidence that they will be worth any more on the market than the bonds already issued by those Governments.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; to be candid, I do not think they will be worth par, but that is not the protection for us to consider.

Mr. MADDEN. Why not?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would oppose any purchase of bonds of the allied Governments if it was not going to help us more effectively to prosecute this war. That is the very object of it, and we leave it to the Executive, to the war-fighting power of our Government, to use the $3,000,000,000 for the best interests of this country in order to quicken the termination of the war in which we are engaged, and if the Executive thinks that a loan to a foreign Government is the best way to do it, I for one am willing to give him such authority. The Constitution provides that the President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

Mr. MADDEN. I realize all that, but the Members of the House and Senate ought not to be mere automatons. They ought to get information upon which to base their judgment. Although the people of the United States recognize the fact that the President is at the head of the Army and Navy and charged with the prosecution of the war, I apprehend they do not expect the Members of Congress to sit here and blindly do the things that are expected to be done without finding out why they are doing those things.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. CALDWELL. Is it contemplated that any firm of bankers or brokers or fiscal agents of a foreign country are to collect any commission or revenue of any kind whatsoever by reason of this loan?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is expressly provided that no commission shall be allowed or paid on any bonds issued under authority of this act.

Mr. CALDWELL. Has any inquiry been made to see what kind of a contract the fiscal agents of these foreign countries in the United States have as regards any additional bonds that are sold here?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; we have not investigated that, because it is not necessary under the provisions of this bill, which forbids the paying of any commissions.

Mr. CALDWELL. The bill forbids the Government paying any commissions, but does it forbid anybody in the United States from collecting commissions from a foreign Government? Let me tell the gentleman what I have in mind. It is the usual and customary thing in the financial district in New York that when a country or a company or any kind of a concern or aggregation of people are endeavoring to float bonds to obtain money for the fiscal agent to take a contract not only for those bonds but for future issues of bonds providing that it is to get them at a certain rate and a certain commission. Now, for instance, if the contract held by J. Pierpont Morgan & Co. with the foreign countries that they represent specified in advance, before we issue these bonds, that on all bonds sold in the United States, whether through their office or through some other office—that is the usual term—they should receive all over and above 98 and a commission of 2 per cent, then what protection have we that J. Pierpont Morgan & Co. are not going to collect 4 per cent on the bonds issued?

Mr. KITCHIN. We have no protection in this bill and could not put any such protection in this bill if they already have such a contract. This bill reposes confidence in the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, and they are to issue these bonds. They are to take the bonds of the foreign Governments, and I believe that they will protect the interests of the United States as well as you or I or our committee of the House could do it.

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not want the gentleman to understand for a minute that I have not as much faith in the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury as he has, but the point is this: This legislative body is about to practically instruct the purchase of $3,000,000,000 of bonds. Now, if there is in existence a contract between a foreign country and a citizen of this United States or a citizen of any other country by which that person is going to collect $100,000,000 for our purchase I think we should put something in the statute to stop it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. I notice, by section 7, that one-fifth of 1 per cent on the bonds and one-tenth of 1 per cent on the $2,000,000,000 certificates, amounting in all to $12,000,000, is given to the Secretary of the Treasury in a lump sum for the purpose of meeting the expenses of issuing these bonds and certificates. Can the gentleman explain why the Secretary of the Treasury should not perform this work on the same conditions as he runs the Treasury? This is more money than we appropriate to run the whole Treasury. It gives him $12,000,000 with which to do what he pleases and to play favorites, and we will have more trouble than we had in the Civil War.

Mr. KITCHIN. With every bond issue that we have authorized for the last 50 years we have provided for one-tenth of 1 per cent to meet the necessary expenditures of the issue.

Mr. STEENERSON. This is one-fifth of 1 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. One-fifth of 1 per cent for the bonds and one-tenth of 1 per cent for the certificates of indebtedness. The Secretary of the Treasury came before our committee, at our request, and explained all that, and the full committee considered it. At first some took the view that the gentleman is now taking, but finally the committee was practically unanimous, and the opinion was that this was necessary and that it was a fair and reasonable amount to be charged. The gentleman must remember that the cost of printing and everything else has advanced about 100 per cent.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman knows that the whole cost of running the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is only $4,000,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has the rate been raised from one-tenth of 1 per cent to one-fifth of 1 per cent on the theory that the actual cost for providing these bonds has doubled?

Mr. KITCHIN. That entered partly into it, but the cost of advertising and the placing of bonds of such an immense amount throughout the United States was, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, who has looked thoroughly into the matter and consulted with the Government experts, thought to be necessary. We are not experts and I do not believe many of us are, and we preferred to take the view of these men who are experts.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me say that the one-tenth of 1 per cent for the issuance of bonds which has been appropriated heretofore has been more than ample, and the mere suggestion that advertising will be so much greater——

Mr. KITCHIN. That is only one factor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will not justify the $6,000,000 additional. For my own part I should be glad to have the gentleman give any facts more than the one that there has been some increase in the cost of advertising.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will give the gentleman the further fact which would increase it, and that is the reissue of the bonds provided for in case the bonds do not sell for 3½ per cent. In that event, the cost of the new issue would be as much as the original issue.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That may be, but that all comes out of the new issue.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know whether or not it will cost more than $10,000,000, but I do know that the experts who have been doing this work and the Secretary of the Treasury have considered the matter thoroughly, and it is their opinion that this is a reasonable amount and that they ought to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Knowing something about experts, I venture the opinion that nobody in the Treasury or anyone else can justify an authorization of one-fifth of 1 per cent for doing this work. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I can not see how the Government would lose anything. Suppose it does not cost $12,000,000; suppose it costs only $8,000,000; we will have $4,000,000 unexpended.

Mr. FITZGERALD. On that theory we might appropriate the whole proceeds; but that is not the way we run the Government.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will repeat what I said a while ago. We have to take somebody's expert knowledge, somebody who knows the intricacies and the technicalities of such work, in preference to the opinion of the gentleman from Minnesota or the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. SABATH. If I am not mistaken, the gentleman made a statement that the bill provides for interest at 3½ per cent, and that if for any reason the bonds should not be sold at that rate we are authorized to reissue them.

Mr. KITCHIN. To convert them.

Mr. SABATH. To convert them into bonds bearing a higher rate of interest?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Has the committee considered—and I suppose it has, for there is this provision in the bill—that it may retard the sale of the bonds at 3½ per cent; that people will refuse to purchase them at 3½ per cent but will want to wait to secure a higher rate of interest?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say that that is not the view of the Secretary of the Treasury or the administration. We discussed it fully.

Mr. SABATH. I think that that language ought to be eliminated.

Mr. KITCHIN. We finally concluded that it would be best to leave that language in, considering the immense amount of bonds we had to float.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. In what denominations will these bonds be issued? Are they going to be put within the reach of hundreds of thousands of people of this country who want to make a small investment? Are you going to give us any baby bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say to the gentleman that the denomination of the bonds was left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, but it is provided that they shall first be offered as a popular loan to all of the people.

Mr. HOWARD. In what denomination?

Mr. KITCHIN. Such denomination as the Secretary of the Treasury may conclude will be best for their sale.

Mr. HOWARD. I see it is suggested in the press that some of these bonds would probably be issued at $20. Does the gentleman know whether any of them would be issued in that denomination?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am sure that many will be issued as low as $50, and perhaps they will be issued as low as $20. I do not know; but they will be issued in whatever denominations it is believed will be most conducive to the purchase by the people generally by popular subscription. The Secretary will fix the denomination.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the bill provides that these bonds shall be first offered as a popular loan at not less than par, and as to any bonds not so disposed of it is provided——

Mr. KITCHIN. That they can be disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury on the best terms that he can make.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does that give the Secretary of the Treasury authority to dispose of the bonds at less than par?

Mr. KITCHIN. That was not called to our attention, but in reading the bill carefully I think the power would really be given to him to do that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Would be?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think so, under the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman think it would be wise, if it is demonstrated that we can not float a popular loan at par, that the bonds should be offered otherwise at less than par?

Mr. KITCHIN. The Secretary of the Treasury has the power to do it, I understand from that provision.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Have we reached the point yet where we should authorize anyone to dispose of the bonds of the United States at less than par? I think that is a very serious question, and I ask it so that the gentleman will discuss it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Suppose it is less than par; suppose after the Secretary has submitted this to popular subscription, there should be three billions taken at 3½ per cent, and he can not sell the remaining two billions at 3½ per cent—that is, at par—and he must take either ninety-eight or ninety-seven, then either the Secretary of the Treasury has to be given that power or else Congress has to give him the power by special act.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not necessarily. We might still dispose of our bonds at par by providing a higher rate of interest.

Mr. KITCHIN. One or the other.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me suggest to the gentleman that if we sell $3,000,000,000 of bonds at par by popular subscription and then sell the same bonds to the extent of $2,000,000,000 to the financial syndicates at less than par, we will have a result that we have been condemning for many years.

Mr. KITCHIN. We will not sell the bonds in that manner.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I imagine that is the only way they can be sold, if they can not be sold at par.

Mr. KITCHIN. So the gentleman's remedy would be to sell them at 4 per cent if we can not sell them at 3½. If that be so, we would not sell any at 3½.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My remedy would be, if they are not sold at popular subscription, then to dispose of them otherwise at not less than par, because I believe we can compel these bonds to be taken——

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman that when the time comes I shall have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am asking the gentleman for his views upon the matter. I have my own.

Mr. KITCHIN. I myself would prefer to provide that we should not sell them below par.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It involves such a tremendous question in our fiscal policy that the matter should be seriously considered.

Mr. KITCHIN. If we should adjourn and the Secretary of the Treasury can not sell the bonds at 3½—that is, the balance—he would have to wait until we got back here, or we would have to come back in extra session to give him additional authority.

Mr. FITZGERALD. From conferences which I have had with men who are familiar with financial conditions I am assured that $5,000,000,000 will not scratch the available money resources of the United States for the use of the Government at this time. We ought not to discredit our own bonds at the outset.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman that I am sure every man on the committee, when he voted for this bill, thought the Secretary could not sell any of the bonds under any circumstances for less than par; but after reading the bill this morning I came to the conclusion that really by the words of it he could, although it was not the intention to so provide. I propose to bring that matter up with our committee before we finish the consideration of the bill, and discuss it with the committee before I offer a committee amendment. I am sure the committee, as well as the Secretary, was under the impression that they should all be sold for not less than par.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Does not the gentleman think the very fact that there may be some permissive authority in the bill to sell bonds in the future at less than par would influence a great many people in the country to withhold purchase at first?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is correct.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Instead of going on the market at first?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Whereas if it was made positive they could not get them below par, they would come in at first and buy them?

Mr. KITCHIN. As I said to the gentleman, I have made note of this, and I intend before the bill is passed, when we get to the consideration of it under the five-minute rule, to call together our committee and put this proposition before it.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will first yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, the Farm Loan Bureau of this country is offering bonds at 4½ per cent with the security of 50 per cent agricultural loans. Now, will these bonds sell at par? Will these bonds sell above par?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know, but I think these bonds will sell at par; I do not know about the farm-loan bonds.

Mr. LOBECK. They are 4½ per cent bonds and are secured by 50 per cent of all of the best agricultural land in the country.

Mr. KITCHIN. I should think they would sell at par.

Mr. LOBECK. And they are sold under the guaranty of the Government.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MASON. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that I think he is laboring under a misapprehension as to the cost and the process of the distribution of bonds in the past. I remember distinctly the sale of the first bonds—I think of $200,000,000—for the Spanish War.

The law in that Congress, which I propose to offer as an amendment to this bill, provides for a public distribution, substantially as the gentleman has it in the bill, with this addition—that those who subscribe in the smaller allotments be made first; and I presume from a reading of the bill that that might be done and that that would be a matter of discretion with the Secretary of the Treasury. But upon the question of cost I have here before me Mr. Gage's report. I remember distinctly he, as Secretary of the Treasury, opposed the distribution of these bonds by popular loan, saying that it would cost more. Now, as a matter of fact, that loan was small; it was infinitesimal compared with what we are about to do; and yet over 240,000 people subscribed for sums of $500 and less, just as they would do now probably, only in a larger number and larger amounts. I have his report as to the cost, and it is eighteen one-hundredths of 1 per cent upon that small loan; and I would respectfully suggest, and I expect to offer, unless the chairman can convince me that it is unnecessary, that this amendment should go on, saying that the bonds should be allotted to the smaller subscribers first, and not only that there should be no commission paid, but that there should be some assurance in the legislation, not that we have any doubt about the honesty of the Secretary of the Treasury, but in order that there may be no mistake made, that there should be some provision made that in accepting these foreign bonds, with our bonds practically as security for them, that there should be no adjustment or arrangement made with the banking houses whereby large amounts of money which have been made from the sale of bonds in the past could be made in the future.

In other words, I hope the chairman will see the propriety of putting in an amendment allowing allotment to the smaller bidders first. An examination of Mr. Gage's report will show that it costs less that way than in any other way; but the thing we want to do, as it seems to me, is to put the people of this country in close touch with the administration of this Government. The chairman of this committee and I both voted against this declaration of war; but, speaking for myself, we are now at war and everyone of us, of all convictions, have determined to do that thing which is best to make a successful termination of that war, and to that end there is nothing so important as to inspire the people of this country with confidence, respect, and affection for the administration, and there is nothing that will bring it so near as to follow the Biblical injunction that "where your treasure is there will your heart be also." [Applause.] If you will put these bonds—the $20, these $50 bonds—out in the post offices, as you did in the Spanish War, I believe they will be subscribed for forty or fifty times over by the people. I simply suggest to the chairman this idea in favor of the amendment which I propose to offer.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can answer all of the gentleman's question; but I will say, appreciating the reasons that the gentleman has given, that we inserted this provision in the bill which will cover his proposition:

The bonds herein authorized shall first be offered at not less than par as a popular loan, under such regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury as will give all citizens of the United States an equal opportunity to participate therein.

I presume the Secretary of the Treasury will take the same view as the gentleman does. We felt also that these bonds should be issued in such denominations or in such terms as will get just as many American citizens to take them as possible, but we were of the opinion that it was best to leave this matter to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MASON. I do not want to delay the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield.

Mr. MASON. Just for a suggestion: Would it not be better to put in the old law, the law of 10 or 20 years ago, that allotments should be made to the first small subscribers? It does not embarrass or delay it in any way, and I hope that that will be put in the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand the gentleman is going to consider some suggestions——

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to call his attention to the fact that if the committee intends to make section 2 effective for the purpose intended without further action by Congress the language specifically appropriating the money must be contained in it. Now, there is one other thing. I understand these credits are to be extended under our war power under the general-welfare clause?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I had in mind to offer this amendment, but I shall suggest it now and submit it to the tender mercies of the gentleman's committee.

Amend section 2 to read as follows:

To enable the President more effectively to prosecute the war against the Imperial German Government by establishing credits in the United States for foreign Governments at war with the Imperial German Government during the continuation of the war between this country and the Imperial Government.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. FITZGERALD. What I had in mind was this: That in the first place we ought to state the purpose of the issuance of these bonds. They ought to be limited to Governments at war with the Imperial German Government, and the power ought to be restricted to the duration of the war.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman that another similar amendment has been submitted to me. That is, in line 21, page 2, after the word "Governments," insert "in order to more effectually prosecute the war in which the United States is now engaged." That would cover about what the gentleman wants.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It would not limit the Government with which credits might be established. I presume the purpose of this is, as we all understand, to aid the nations now at war with Germany.

Mr. KITCHIN. I imagine as a matter of policy it would not be the wisest thing to put in the names of the Governments in that way.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not naming any Governments.

Mr. KITCHIN. And I repeat again that, on line 21, page 2, after the word "Governments," it strikes me this should go in, and that it would cover your proposition, not entirely, but the spirit of it: "In order to more effectually prosecute the war in which the United States is engaged." I think that that is needed there, and possibly needed for another purpose, namely, in order to make this absolutely constitutional and so that it is a war measure. Because in times of peace I have very serious doubts whether under the Constitution Congress can appropriate money to buy bonds of foreign Governments; but when you put such a provision in the bill it makes it a war measure entirely, and I think it eliminates any doubt as to its constitutionality.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. The language the gentleman suggests would not in fact be any restriction whatsoever upon the Secretary?

Mr. KITCHIN. It would not be, except that we thought it best and wisest not to mention any governments.

Mr. LENROOT. If it was confined to belligerent Governments.

Mr. KITCHIN. The administration thought it was not advisable to put such a provision in the bill. And I will say, personally, that some of us were in favor of putting it in.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the gentleman that on page 2, line 21, after the word "governments," I had intended to offer an amendment as follows: "at war with Germany." The gentleman will recall that that question was discussed, but the question of expediency and propriety at once arose as to whether it might not hamper the President in certain "arrangements," which is the word used in the bill, that he might desire to make with certain nations to more speedily bring the war to a close, not necessarily nations engaged in the war with Germany.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is true.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Is there any reason why this authority given to the Secretary of the Treasury should not be restricted to the duration of the war between the United States and Germany?

Mr. KITCHIN. I should think that the whole point and intent would be that.

Mr. LENROOT. But this may go on as permanent legislation as it reads. Hereafter, 10 years from now, they could loan the money of the United States to Mexico or to the South American Republics.

Mr. KITCHIN. As it is, that might be true, but not if you put in the words which I suggested.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman concedes that is not a restriction at all?

Mr. KITCHIN. I concede that when you put in the words "in order to more effectually prosecute the war in which the United States is engaged" it would. I would say it could not be after peace was made.

Mr. LENROOT. Would the gentleman have any objection to expressly stating in the bill that authority shall terminate when peace is declared between the United States and Germany?

Mr. KITCHIN. It think it would with the amendment I suggested.

Mr. FESS. We are at war with Germany, but not with Austria or Bulgaria or Turkey. Will the loan to the allies, which are at war with these three countries, be regarded as an act of war against them?

Mr. KITCHIN. I really can not tell the gentleman. I will say it is necessary not to confine it to Germany, because we do not know what other steps we may have to take in the future. We do not know what countries we may be at war with before peace is reached. We may be at war with this country or that in our war with Germany, and therefore it would be unwise to limit it to Germany, because then we might have to come back in an extra session and put in a provision for war with other countries.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, in answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], if we were at peace and were to lend money or give direct Government aid to certain nations at war, that would be an unfriendly act as to such nations' enemies. But all of the countries that the gentleman has mentioned are aiding the country with which we are at war with men and supplies. That has not forced us into war with them, and our supplying moneys to the nations that are fighting with us against Germany under existing circumstances can not properly be held as an act of war on them.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a further interruption?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. FESS. I am rather of the opinion that our loan will be considered as an act that is unfriendly, but I agree with the chairman that I do not see that we can do anything else.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman if there is anything in this bill that prevents the allies who receive this money—this $3,000,000,000—from the United States from taking up former issues of bonds now in the hands, for instance, of their agents in this country?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, yes.

Mr. HAYES. Should there not be express language in there limiting those bonds to be exchanged for absolutely new issues?

Mr. KITCHIN. The bill expressly provides that the bonds shall be purchased from the foreign Governments on equal terms with the bonds we authorize to be issued, so that could not apply to the bonds of any foreign Government in existence, because there is not in existence any such bond which would comply with the terms that would be put into the United States bonds under this act. They must be bonds hereafter issued, purchased by this Government.

Mr. HAYES. The thought I had was this: There is nothing to prevent these foreign Governments from taking up these higher-rate bonds bearing, some of them, 6 per cent interest and issuing in lieu these bonds or taking the money and retiring those bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. There is nothing specifically to prevent that, but I can hardly conceive that that would be done. If we are going to lend this money to the Governments that we are cooperating with to more effectively prosecute this war, why not leave it to them to expend the proceeds in any way which their judgment tells them is the best way to achieve success in the prosecution of this war and not limit or qualify the use of that money? [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. I presume it might be the best policy, but some time ago I read an article in which it was stated that Great Britain, in making loans to its allies, the smaller and poorer nations, made provision before she agreed to lend this money that all of these moneys that Great Britain is to advance to its allies shall be expended in Great Britain. Now, I do not know, but the chances are that the same arrangement could be made in this case, so that the moneys that will be loaned by this Government to the allies can be, and should be, expended in the first instance in the United States if it can be done. I wish to say that if Great Britain can do it and has successfully done it and has made such arrangements, I do not see why our Government can not make the same arrangements and agreements.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman that if we are going in whole-heartedly to cooperate with the allies in war against Germany, I would not be in favor of qualifying or of limiting their right to expend that money in any way they see fit. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. They are fighting our battles.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. You will understand that they will be fighting with our money their battles, and we will be fighting with our money our battles, too. I will say to the House that the committee has considered what the gentleman has suggested, and we are of the opinion that most of this money that we will loan to the allies for the purchase of their bonds will of necessity have to be expended in the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. They can not use it anywhere else.

Mr. BORLAND. Now, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do.

Mr. BORLAND. On the question of the popular nature of this loan, I want to ask the gentleman whether his committee considered the application of these bonds for the investment of postal savings bank money? You know the postal savings bank money is not now drawing 3½ per cent, and it is accumulating very rapidly. In the last two years, I think, it has nearly trebled, so that there is a large fund now on hand in the postal savings banks which is not drawing 3½ per cent interest. Has the gentleman considered that question?

Mr. KITCHIN. We considered the question of the postal savings banks and other financial institutions as well as people of wealth and people of moderate means, and we expect they will all subscribe to this, and it will be to the interest of the postal savings banks' depositors to buy these bonds.

Mr. BORLAND. Would it not require a special provision in the bill for that purpose in the interest of the postal savings bank depositors themselves?

Mr. MADDEN. The postal savings bank law provided for that very thing.

Mr. KITCHIN. I believe so.

Mr. HAYES. I merely want to suggest the thought that I had, that we should see to it that the money that we seek to provide is used for the prosecution of the war, and not to pay old obligations.

Mr. KITCHIN. That can not be done with this money, and I think it will not be done.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. McFADDEN. I want to ask the chairman of the committee whether he or the other members of the committee have considered the possible effect of this issue of $3,000,000,000 of securities on the $641,000,000 worth of bonds at 2 per cent already issued?

Mr. KITCHIN. As I said earlier in the day, that will have no effect, in my judgment, because the value given to these bonds to which the gentleman refers arises from the fact that they possess circulation privileges, whereas the bonds authorized by this bill do not possess the circulation privilege. The bonds possessing the circulation privilege will be unaffected by the issuance of these new bonds.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman contends that the circulation privilege will maintain the market value of the bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I think that is true.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. There is so much confusion that the proceedings can not be heard. I ask the Chairman either to ask Congress to adjourn or else have its Members listen to this argument. Those gentlemen who want to talk and can not remain quiet while this discussion is going on ought to be requested to retire to the cloak rooms. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Michigan is well taken. Gentlemen will please be seated. All gentlemen will please be seated except the two engaged in the colloquy. Gentlemen on the right of the Speaker's stand and gentlemen on the left will please cease conversation.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the thought I had in mind in connection with that was simply this, that the national banks of the country are carrying to-day six hundred and forty-one million and odd dollars of these 2 per cent securities. I have no doubt that those banks are very much concerned over the issuance of this large amount of securities bearing a much higher rate of interest. I do not quite agree with the chairman in his statement that it will not affect the price of those securities. The bankers of this country are patriotic, and they will invest largely in the new issue of securities. Now this bill that is before us to-day provides for an exchange and a refunding of certain other of the securities, namely, the $63,000,000 of 3 per cent bonds which mature in 1918. The thought occurs to me that in connection with this matter the same exchange privilege should be given to the holder of these 2 per cent bonds that is extended to these other securities.

Mr. KITCHIN. There will be no objection to that, provided the circulation privilege is taken from them. But I will say to the gentleman that I have discussed this matter with bankers who hold some of these 2 per cent bonds, and they do not have that fear.

Mr. SNYDER. I agree with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. I have talked with several bankers this last week, and I do not find any such situation as my friend suggests. I think the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] is right about it. The bankers and people of the country look upon this as a protective, patriotic loan, and there will not be any question about their being taken at par, and there is no occasion for any fear of some one offering them for less or more later on, because, in my judgment, there will not be any to offer in a short time after they have once been offered to the public.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. I have some information that just came through the mail which I would like to give the gentleman. One thousand Russian rubles are equal to $510 United States money. Russian bonds bearing 5½ per cent interest sold in Chicago at $273 per thousand rubles, and United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland bonds, secured by $120 to each $100, bearing 5½ per cent interest, sell to-day at $950 per one thousand. Now, how would the value of these bonds be fixed in exchange?

Mr. KITCHIN. The information which the gentleman has there shows the necessity of this bill and the necessity of our Government helping the allies, especially Russia.

Mr. MADDEN. The question is whether we shall hand them $2 for $1.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not regard that as a question of so very much importance, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois. We are in this war. We ought to do everything possible to help not only the United States, but to help those who are cooperating with us in this war. We ought to help the allies, and if their bonds have gone down to 80 or 75 or 50 per cent, all the more necessity exists for us to loan them this money at the lowest possible rate of interest, because they are helping to fight our cause. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not know whether there is any impropriety in asking this question——

Mr. KITCHIN. If there is, there have been more improprieties committed this morning than I have known in a long time——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I should like to know to what Governments we are going to make these loans.

Mr. BUTLER. To any Government that is cooperating with us.

Mr. KITCHIN. The loans will be made to some of the Governments that are fighting the war with us. I would not care to mention any particular Government.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will suggest to the gentleman that I understand that Great Britain, France, and Russia have pooled their finances and have agreed to share among themselves in certain proportions the expenses of the war. Therefore it is quite important to know whether we are making this loan to the allies as a group or merely to the separate nations.

Mr. KITCHIN. That would be in the discretion of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, but, in my opinion, it would be to the separate nations.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. They will not be bound as a group?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think they will be bound as a group.

Mr. ANDERSON. Section 2, on page 2 of the bill, provides—

That for the purpose of establishing credits in the United States for foreign Governments the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President is hereby authorized—

And so forth. I want to suggest to the gentleman this language instead:

That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national defense and carrying on the war by the establishment of credits in the United States with foreign Governments engaged in war with Germany, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized—

And so forth. It seems to me there are only two purposes for which we can make this loan. One of them is to provide for the national defense and the other is to carry on the war, and that those purposes ought to be expressed in this section.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman that before we reach the five-minute debate I will be glad to consider the language he suggests. It strikes me favorably right now, but I have not time to discuss it at length now.

Mr. ANDERSON. In reference to the appropriating language of this section, it seems to me it would be very much better if instead of the language used in the last sentence of this section, which is, "For the purposes of this section the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use not exceeding $3,000,000,000 of the proceeds of the bonds of the United States that may be sold under authority of section 1 of this act," the language I have suggested should be used.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the gentleman is correct about that. There are some suggestions made by the gentleman from New York also which I think are good ones.

Mr. DEWALT. Referring to section 2, lines 24 and 25, I find that authority is given to the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to buy the obligations of foreign Governments, which shall bear the same rate of interest and contain in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States. The question I desire information upon is this: In the judgment of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, does that clause preclude the possibility of buying the present outstanding bonds of these foreign Governments?

Mr. KITCHIN. It does.

Mr. DEWALT. How does it thus preclude them?

Mr. KITCHIN. Because in the first place you must have bonds of a foreign Government in terms equal to our bonds, the same terms in all essentials with the bonds provided for by this act, and, as no bond of any foreign Government complies in any way with these terms, therefore they are not bonds that can be purchased. The only bonds that can possibly be purchased under the authority of this act are bonds to be hereafter issued by foreign Governments. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. DEWALT. Now, if there be such bonds, the question which arises in my mind, Mr. Chairman, is this: In looking over the stock reports last evening I found that the French bonds now are quoted in the New York market at 94. I do not know at what figure they were sold to the French customers nor what the syndicate paid that purchased them and distributed them, but in my mind there arises this possibility, that the French people who bought the bonds might, at the instigation of the French Government, or the English Government if they were English bonds, return them for a small premium to their respective Governments, and this clause provides that the United States shall buy these obligations at par. Therefore, if there be any outstanding bonds of these respective Governments which are similar in their terms to these bonds proposed to be issued by the United States, the purchasers of the bonds who heretofore obtained them might again sell them to their respective Governments and they would make their small profit, and their Governments would make a profit by selling them at par to the United States. Therefore it strikes me, Mr. Chairman, that the suggestion made by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee ought to be incorporated in the bill that these bonds, if purchased by the United States Government, should be exclusively such bonds as are to be hereafter issued.

Mr. KITCHIN. They are excluded by the very terms of this bill. They are to be bonds hereafter to be issued. But suppose they were not. Take France, for instance, how would it help France to get a billion-dollar loan from us if it had to take it and pay bonds for an indebtedness already incurred? What she needs is a billion dollars to prosecute the war; she wants the money to buy new provisions, new supplies, for new purposes. There would be no sense in her doing otherwise.

Mr. DEWALT. That is rather foreign to my question.

Mr. KITCHIN. I say that it is impossible under the terms of this bill for this Government to purchase from a foreign Government any bonds that have now been issued; they must be bonds issued hereafter, for the reason that there are now no bonds which will comply in the necessary essentials with the bonds authorized in this act.

Mr. DEWALT. Does not the gentleman think it would be the part of wisdom to make it definite in that regard and incorporate the language in the bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us see how much more definite it would be:

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of establishing credits in the United States for foreign Governments, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to purchase from such foreign Governments—

Not for Tom, Dick, or Harry, who now hold those bonds—at par, their obligations, bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act.

That is absolutely exclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I will get through in five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman's time be extended one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from North Carolina be extended one hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question in that connection?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing in the bill which would prevent a foreign Government issuing bonds for the purpose of paying off the indebtedness which it now holds in this country and obtaining bonds from the United States?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is true, if it issued new bonds.

Mr. MANN. Under this bill we would have to buy the foreign bonds from foreign Governments. Take the case of Russia, which desires to establish credit in the United States. There is probably no way it could more firmly establish credit than by paying off the indebtedness which it has already incurred in the United States. Is the gentleman able to say whether, in any of the plans which have been suggested, money that is practically and really loaned to the foreign Governments is to be used in the United States in the main for the purpose of purchasing supplies of various sorts or for the purpose of paying off some of the bonds which are now below par?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is my understanding that it will be used for purchasing supplies, and not for paying past indebtedness.

Mr. MANN. I am not sure which would help the Russian Government the most.

Mr. KITCHIN. But suppose it did; suppose the Russian Government owed a billion dollars. If she paid that billion dollars off to-day, it would establish credit for another billion dollars, and she could buy another billion dollars' worth of supplies on credit.

Mr. MANN. Very well. I agree with the gentleman about that.

Mr. KITCHIN. As I said, I think this money will not be used that way, but will be used to get new supplies and new munitions of war.

Mr. MANN. I do not know which way would do the Russian Government the most good, but I think it would be the sentiment of everybody here that the stockbrokers, or our good friends, the financiers of Wall Street or elsewhere, ought not to be able to thimblerig the matter in such a way that they would be able to collect in full for Russian rubles that are now worth only 50 per cent of par.

Mr. KITCHIN. I agree with the gentleman about that.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. In reference to the same section which provides that the bonds purchased of foreign Governments shall contain in all essentials the same terms and conditions as the United States bonds authorized to be issued in the act, is not one of the essential terms and conditions the time of payment?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Expressed in the obligation?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I would like to ask the gentleman what is meant by the language in lines 3 to 5 on page 3 authorizing the secretary "to enter into such arrangements as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for purchasing such obligations of foreign Governments and for the subsequent payment thereof." What does the language "subsequent payment thereof" mean when the term of payment is expressed in the obligation itself?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman that we were expressly informed by the Secretary of the Treasury that probably some of these bonds, while they may be for, say, 15 or 20 years, would be paid back in perhaps 5 or 6 years, and we permit him to accept payment of those; and there is another provision of the bill that he should apply such payments, if paid, before maturity, to our bonds, but not to pay any premium therefor.

Mr. LENROOT. Then should not the language contain the limitation that the authority to arrange for subsequent payments should not extend beyond the life of the bonds? Ought not Congress to determine that question?

Mr. KITCHIN. If Congress is going to permit the Secretary of the Treasury or the President to fix the date of maturity of our bonds, why should we try to control the date of maturity of foreign bonds, when the law itself provides that they shall be of the same maturity?

Mr. LENROOT. But the language "subsequent payments thereof" would practically vitiate the promise in the foreign obligation as to time of payment through a separate agreement made by the Secretary of the Treasury collateral to and outside of the terms of the bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say to the gentleman, of course, just reading exactly what he did, that he might at first get that inference, but I will ask him to read section 3, which provides:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, under such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, is hereby authorized to receive, on or before maturity, payment for any obligations of such foreign Governments purchased on behalf of the United States—

And so forth.

Mr. LENROOT. Does not that affect that question? In other words, the question is this: Ought there to be a separate agreement, not expressed in the obligation itself, as to time of payment other than payment before due?

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman contend that by any language in this bill the Secretary of the Treasury could extend the payment of a bond of a foreign Government beyond the dates specified in the bond itself?

Mr. LENROOT. There is no question about it. You give him that absolute authority in that language.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say to the gentleman that, in my opinion, there is nothing in the language of the bill in spirit or which through any strained construction could empower the Secretary to do that.

Mr. LENROOT. If here is an obligation maturing in 1918, and we give the Secretary of the Treasury, as you do in this language, power to arrange for subsequent payment of that obligation, you give him power to extend the time of payment.

Mr. KITCHIN. That just shows the gentleman did not read two or three lines beyond that, just cut off by a comma—but such arrangements shall provide that if any of the bonds of the United States issued and used for the purchase of such foreign obligations shall thereafter be converted into other bonds of the United States, * * * then and in that event the obligations of such foreign Governments held by the United States shall be, by such foreign Governments, converted in like manner and extent into obligations bearing the same rate of interest as the bonds of the United States issued under the provisions of section 5 of this act.

Then section 3 provides that he may receive payment before due, and in section 2 there is a provision that these bonds shall have the same essential terms and conditions. What is an essential term? The maturity thereof, the rate of interest, the amount, are absolutely essential.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman is a lawyer, and he well understands the elementary rule of law that general language and general authority are controlled by specific language and specific authority, and if Congress gives the right to the Secretary of the Treasury to make a different contract than that contained in the obligation with reference to a specific term of that obligation, the specific authority controls the general language.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from North Carolina will permit, I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] that my understanding of that language is that it does not give the Secretary of the Treasury power to extend the time of any bonds which foreign Governments have issued, but it does give him power to accept payment prior to the maturity of the bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is all there is to it.

Mr. HILL. It is directly the opposite of the contention of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Would the gentleman have any objection to so expressing it—that the subsequent payment thereof be before maturity?

Mr. HILL. I do not see how any language could violate the contract that will be made. I think it does give him power to accept voluntary payment before, and it was suggested in the committee that possibly some of these bonds which we take would be paid before becoming due by the foreign Governments.

Mr. LENROOT. That is my only point.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would not object to that amendment at all.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit further, it will not be possible for me to participate in this debate as I would like to. I intend to vote for this bill just as it stands, if it is not amended. If I had my way personally, I would make one amendment, and that would be this: It covers all of these questions which have been asked in the last half hour, in my judgment. I do not believe it is possible to specify now in this bill the purpose for which this money shall be used that is loaned to foreign Governments. We do not know what is ahead of us. I do not believe it is possible—although I did prepare an amendment to that effect and then did not offer it in the committee—to specify to what Governments it shall be loaned. We have got to trust the future and the persons who will then have control of it. I wish to broaden that control. I recognize, if the gentleman from North Carolina will pardon me, that the time is going to run and conditions will change materially before we can know what we must face ultimately. What I would like is to see a permanent committee chosen from the representatives of the people unite in some way with the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the present and future disposition and management of this loan.

I would like to see the gentleman holding the position occupied by the gentleman from North Carolina named on such a committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], from the Appropriations Committee, named on such a committee, and all parties and all views brought together by naming Mr. GILLETT and the corresponding member on the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. FORDNEY, all to unite with the President in the control and disposition of this money in the future. I would ask the same of the two corresponding committees in the Senate. These committees are standing committees. Congress can not do it, because Congress may not be in session; but a small committee, covering the representatives of the people, the committee that raises the money and the committee that expends it, might act with the President in regard to this enormous financial transaction, the greatest the world has ever seen. I do not want to distrust the President and I do not want the President to distrust the American people in this matter. [Applause.] Let us go forward unitedly as one people, with no party distinctions, in disposing of and controlling this amount during the entire life of this bill, which may be 30 or 50 years; nobody knows what it will be. Let them be brought all together in the control and disposition of this great sum of $3,000,000,000, which can only come from the resources of the people. That is the only amendment you can make which will fully meet the situation, Mr. Chairman, and you well know it. Presidents change and Secretaries of the Treasury change, but I hope that the legislative power of the people may continue. We know that no proposition specifying countries can go in here safely now; that no proposition specifying how this money shall be spent can go in here safely now. We have got to trust somebody. Let us trust the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do.

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Chairman, by the question asked by the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] and the suggestions of several gentlemen on the floor, it is apparent that the idea carried in this bill is not understood relative to the foreign bonds, many gentlemen having the understanding that this money could be used to buy our bonds outstanding in this country now. Therefore would it not be wise—I offer this as a suggestion to the chairman of the committee—that an amendment be made in line 24, page 2, after the word "obligations," by inserting the words "hereafter issued"?

Mr. KITCHIN. I really do not see any harm in such an amendment, and I would not object to that, but I do not think it would add anything to it.

Mr. HELVERING. I understand that——

Mr. KITCHIN. But it will do no harm, and if it would satisfy gentlemen I do not think I would object to it.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DEWALT. I would suggest with reference to the proposed amendment of which the gentleman has just spoken that the amendment be on page 3, line 2, after the word "act," in this form: "Amend section 2 by inserting in line 2, page 3, after the word 'act,' the words 'but such purchases of obligations shall be confined to obligations authorized and issued after the passage of this act and shall not apply to any obligations authorized or issued prior thereto.'"

Mr. KITCHIN. I would suggest that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas covers that exactly.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, why talk about something that is beyond even an eventuality and is simply impossible? These bonds now issued by other Governments bear interest way above 3½ per cent. What Government with any common sense would undertake to issue those obligations to this Government when they could issue new obligations at 3½ per cent?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have explained that a half dozen times.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. In reference to the suggestions that have been made by gentlemen that the loan we make may be used by foreign Governments to cover obligations already issued, is not this the fact: If you make this great loan, the greatest in all history, it will be for the purpose of sustaining and extending the credit of foreign Governments at war with our enemy?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is true.

Mr. MONDELL. We shall accomplish our purpose best if we use these funds in the way by which the cause of these foreign Governments will best be sustained and their credit extended, and what if they should refund some of the bonds now outstanding in order to bring them under the provisions and conditions of this bill?

If in the opinion of these Governments such action would best sustain, extend, and strengthen their credit, will we not have accomplished just what we have set out to accomplish through that method? And therefore why should we be disturbed if by reissuing or refunding, some obligations already resting on foreign Governments, they may be relieved through the loans we make? [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume the committee has given consideration in authorizing this loan to the question of security, and I would like to inquire, because the question is one I think very pertinent, as to whether any information was furnished the committee as to the time of the maturity of these bonds? Many believe that it might involve us ultimately in entangling alliances if these bonds are ever to be owned by this Government, and when peace has been declared the sooner that we relieve ourselves of this bonded indebtedness the better for the welfare of the country in following out the policy long established of merely confining ourselves to American affairs. Now, I wish to ask whether any information was furnished the committee as to the duration of these bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. The Secretary of the Treasury said, however, that he thought some of these Governments would be able to meet their obligation in some four or five years after the loan was actually made, and especially after peace. But we thought best under all the circumstances and facts presented to us to leave the date of maturity to the discretion of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. The date of maturity is going to be the same as the date of maturity in the United States bonds that we issue.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Does the gentleman have any knowledge as to whether or not there will be any existing contracts by which there must be commissions paid to certain bonding houses in this country for any bonds that are sold in this country?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I have no information on that.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Does not the gentleman think it would be wise, in order to carry out the intention of this particular act and to give the very highest degree of results to the people with whom we deal at the lowest possible expense to them, that we should write a provision in this bill forbidding the payment of commission by any foreign Government whose bonds we shall purchase to any concern in this country for that purpose, or anyone else?

Mr. KITCHIN. As you will see on page 2, line 18, no commissions are allowed in any way for the issuance of any bonds authorized under this act.

Mr. RAGSDALE. That is, our bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. Now, so far as a foreign Government is concerned, I doubt whether we are in a position to legislate on that subject, and I for one am willing to leave it to the President and the Secretary. We have to leave a great many things of more importance and of more momentous character than this to them, and I believe that they will purchase those bonds and see that they are issued in a way that will redound to the real interest of the Governments to which we make this loan.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will permit, this bill provides we must deal directly with the foreign Governments.

Mr. RAGSDALE. While I understand that this bill provides that we shall deal directly with the foreign governments, if the gentleman has had any experience in financing of loans for people who are borrowers from some of these big loaning concerns, he knows that, no matter who gets a loan in certain localities, under the contracts that they have with their general agents, no matter who places them, they receive a commission. Now, why should not the United States Government say that regardless of any condition that now exists a new condition has been created under this act by which we come into the war, by which we propose to protect our allies in giving them this credit, and by which they forbid any American citizen from taking any commission from any foreign Government where we take their bonds. Why is it not within our power to control the acts of American citizens and make it an improper thing for them to do?

Mr. KITCHIN. As I have said several times, I think, so far as I am concerned, I will not be bothered about that. I believe we will be protected. The interest of the allies to whom we loan the money and our interests will be protected by the President and by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from South Carolina has raised a point that, to my mind, is crucial in this whole matter. I assume that we want to avoid entangling alliances, and I assume that if we attempt to dictate to a foreign nation to which we have loaned money the terms on which it shall deal with anybody else, we interfere with its internal affairs. I question whether the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] or any other Member of Congress would tolerate for a minute a suggestion from a foreign Government as to whom we should employ to do business for us. What we want to avoid is such entanglements as will involve us in the political or economic conditions of foreign Governments. They stand on their own ground and we stand on ours. They make their own terms and we are making ours. We are protecting ourselves, therefore, from the dangers the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if it is interfering in any way with the power of the country whose bonds we buy if we say it is improper for a bonding house in the United States, or for citizens in the United States, to take commissions out of the money which we are taxing the people of the United States to carry on the war?

Mr. KITCHIN. Do you believe that the President and the Secretary of the Treasury at this moment, when it is our purpose only to help the allies, would permit any foreign Shylocks to gouge the allies?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Certainly not, if they can prevent it; but I would like——

Mr. KITCHIN. They can prevent it, because it is in the discretion of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. They can make any condition before they buy any of these bonds.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Now, if the gentleman from North Carolina will permit me, suppose there exists, as I believe there does exist, an agreement at this time between the allies and certain bonding houses in the United States by which the bonding houses receive commissions on all bonds sold in the United States without regard to who purchases them. Suppose they hold the allies to this agreement. The allies can not in honesty say they will not pay that commission. But if the act of the United States Government or the act of the American Congress under which these bonds are to be purchased makes it impossible for them to accept it, then the foreign Government, having that, may keep faith with the citizens of this country and this Government, because our citizens may not then violate our laws and accept that which otherwise the foreign Government would stand ready to pay. I would protect the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, and I would protect foreign Governments dealing with us and make it improper and illegal for American citizens to hold up our allies and bleed them under conditions of this kind. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. One moment, please. The Chair desires to admonish the occupants of the galleries that under the rules applause or manifestations of approval or disapproval will not be permitted. The Chair begs the occupants of the galleries to observe this rule of the House.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I agree fully with the gentleman's premises that the object here is to assist the allies, and I want to ask him if the committee has thought of any other way than buying the bonds of the allies by which we could help them and probably assist them to get the money more readily even than they will in this way? I think that if the United States Government would make the proposition to the Imperial Government of Great Britain to buy their North American possessions, paying therefor $10,000,000,000 and issuing therefor our bonds, would that not be a wise proposition? They can sell those bonds, backed by that security, in addition to the other wealth of the United States Government, much above par, and they can get all the money they need to finance their Government and we are not taking any doubtful risks whatever. Besides, we can help to democratize Canada.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say to the gentleman that that raises such a big question that really the Committee on Ways and Means had not reached it. [Laughter.] We had not thought about that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the gentleman will indulge me again——

Mr. KITCHIN. I will think about it hereafter, I will say to the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, well, as to buying foreign possessions we have recently paid $25,000,000 for a little bunch of islands down here in the West Indies, and I tell you that Canada, compared with it, even at $10,000,000,000 or $20,000,000,000, would be an excellent investment, and we had better pay to Great Britain enough money to finance their war if it should last for even 10 years, and more than that, if thereby they could with the money get relays of men from their own possessions and train them and not ask us to send our boys into the trenches of Europe for a cause not really ours. [Applause.]

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. I noticed on page 2 that the bonds we issue are to be exempt from taxation by Federal and State Governments. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means whether he thinks the "like terms and conditions clause" would protect us against excessive European war taxes on the bonds we buy; and if that would not protect it, would it not be a good idea to provide in the bill that the bonds we buy shall be exempt from taxation in the European countries where issued, just as our bonds are exempt from taxation here?

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand that all bonds are issued with that condition in them.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think the language between lines 12 and 19, on page 2, is apt to work injury to the sale of public bonds. The language is—

> The bonds herein authorized shall first be offered at not less than par as a popular loan, under such regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury as will give all citizens of the United States an equal opportunity to participate therein; and any portion of the bonds so offered and not subscribed for may be otherwise disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Would not that give the people the idea that, after all they had subscribed and paid at par for bonds, the Secretary of the Treasury might drop the value of the bonds and the bankers and others might get them for less? And would not an amendment of a few words—for instance, the striking out of the semicolon and adding the words "not less than par," on line 18—be beneficial?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. I think that ought to go in. I made a note of that before I addressed the House.

Mr. JUUL. I tried to sit back here and listen, but there is such a noise all around that we lose half of what we want to hear. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again endeavor to obtain order. The Chair wishes to repeat what he stated a few moments ago. Frequently a few gentlemen will not be interested in what is going on at the immediate time and will indulge in conversation, and thereby disturb a number of gentlemen who are sitting about them who do desire to hear. The Chair thinks that gentlemen who desire to converse owe it not only to themselves but to those who are on the floor and to those who do wish to hear to retire where their conversation will not be disturbing.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I would like to ask the chairman whether or not in considering this measure the committee considered the advisability of providing that the redemption of these bonds purchased from any one of the foreign powers at war with Germany should be guaranteed by the other foreign powers at war with Germany?

Mr. KITCHIN. That was not discussed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The fact is that if we ever get this money back at all when the war is won we will get off cheap.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I asked that question, or made that suggestion, for the reason that I believe it will make this legislation far more popular among the people of the United States, who will thereby be led to believe that this is a business transaction—money loaned and expected to be repaid—if there is a guarantee given by the other powers, guaranteeing the redemption of the bonds purchased by any of the other powers, and for this reason: The credit of some of these nations is good while the credit of some others of them is not so good, and if we are to conduct this as a business transaction and not as a gift we ought to proceed to give the protection within the bill itself. We ought to provide that some assurance be at least given by this body, that is spending money by the billions, that some of the money may be repaid.

Mr. EMERSON. I have listened to all these questions, and I should like to ask the chairman of the committee one question: I presume the committee went over this bill carefully, did they not? [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman ought not to treat this thing with such levity.

Mr. EMERSON. I am just asking——

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; they did.

Mr. EMERSON. Does this bill have the indorsement of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. KITCHIN. As I said in the beginning, it has the indorsement of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury and the members of the Cabinet and all the Democratic, Republican, and Progressive members of the Ways and Means Committee. [Applause.]

Mr. EMERSON. That is all I want to know.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. HARDY. If my understanding is correct, the lines at the bottom of page 2 and at the beginning of page 3 stipulate that these bonds of foreign Governments which we take must be conditioned the same as the bonds issued by us?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; in all essentials.

Mr. HARDY. One essential element of our bonds is that they are exempt from taxation. We are now occupying the position of contemplated ownership. Does not the gentleman think that it would be best to have it expressly stipulated in this bill that the bonds we buy are to be exempt from taxation by the Government issuing them ?

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman think that is one of the essentials?

Mr. HARDY. It seems to me so.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then that provision must go in the bond, so it is not necessary to insert it specifically in the bill. If that is one of the essentials, then according to the terms of this bill that provision must go into the bonds. But I will say that all Government bonds are written in that way, anyhow. I never saw a State bond or Government bond of this country or of any foreign Government that did not have an express exemption from taxation.

Mr. HARDY. I think we ought to be very sure that they are exempt.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think there will be no question about that.

Mr. HARDY. In reference to the question asked by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE], is it a fact that there is any commission agency in the United States that has a contract for a commission on the sale of these bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know. We had no evidence with reference to that. There may or may not be.

Mr. HARDY. If there were, there might arise a question as to whether such agent is entitled to the commission on these bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me say to the gentleman from Texas, suppose there was such a contract; suppose it to be right to put in the qualification which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] says ought to be put into this law; does not the gentleman think we can trust the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, before they issue the bonds, to do the right thing? It is in their discretion. They are not bound to do it. If they find out that there is any commission house in this country, or anybody who is shylocking the allies, does not the gentleman think they will say, "Look here, this contract must be avoided," if that is to the interest of the allies?

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman think that the administrative officers ought to be expected to think of every essential thing?

Mr. KITCHIN. They can find out a great deal better than you or I can whether there is such a contract between the allies and anybody in this country, or whether it is conscionable or unconscionable. We must leave that to them, and we do leave it to them. If the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] knows of any evidence or any fact tending to sustain what he says, if he will produce it to the Secretary of the Treasury or to the President, or if he will tell me about it, I will communicate it to them, and they will protect the allies and themselves. I am sure of that.

Mr. HARDY. The only thing with me was that an inhibition of that kind would be so simple and easy to put into the bill that I did not know whether the gentleman would object to it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I would object to it, anyway, because it might be to the interest of the allies to comply with these contracts. They may be proper contracts.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Will these bonds stand on the same basis as the Panama Canal bonds and the Philippine bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. What does the gentleman mean by "on the same basis"?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. The insurance departments of a great many States will not take Panama Canal bonds or Philippine bonds, because the faith and credit of the United States Government are not pledged to their redemption, but only the taxes derived from the pledges.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not true of the Panama Canal bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. The Panama Canal bonds are entirely different. They are bonds of the Government direct, and I will say to the gentleman that by the terms of this very act the Panama Canal bonds to be issued hereafter are put upon an exact equality with these $5,000,000,000 of bonds which we are going to authorize here. There are $222,000,000 of the Panama Canal bonds available to be issued.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Do I understand that the faith and credit of the Government are pledged to the redemption of these bonds and stand back of these bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. Absolutely. They are bonds of the Government.

Mr. BURNETT. In regard to the questions suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] as to commissions on these bonds, it is a well-known fact that there are large houses in this country that did profit by just such commissions in negotiating the loans that the allies have negotiated in this country before, and, on the basis that they have done that, is it not a very proper and reasonable assumption that they will do the same thing again?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think there have been contracts for the purchase of munitions of war and that sort of thing, but if you will let me give you my opinion about this, I will say that I have no idea that they will make a copper cent out of any of the bonds that this Government will buy from the foreign Governments; and if they have any such contracts the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury will find it out, and they will do what is right and best and proper to protect the allies from any such contracts heretofore or hereafter made.

Mr. BURNETT. But if the contract is already made and the commissions paid, then those contracts certainly could not be annulled.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; not if the commissions are already paid.

Mr. BURNETT. How will they find it out? Probably they will not find it out until months afterwards.

Mr. KITCHIN. If we put a provision in the bill, in order to carry out that provision somebody would have to find it out. The President would have to find it out in order to enforce that provision, and if you do not have that provision in the bill he will have to find it out if he is going to protect the allies in that particular.

Mr. BURNETT. My idea is that much of the propaganda for this war was financed at least by those who had these very financial interests in view, and had we not better put a check on that now, while we can, instead of letting them do it, and then locking the stable after the horse is gone?

Mr. KITCHIN. You know, before April 5 I had a little fear that they had something to do with this propaganda, too, but I do not think about that now.

Mr. BURNETT. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not still have that fear? I do not want to commit him on that.

Mr. KITCHIN. The committee considered this phase of the matter, and I think they will be amply protected by leaving this as it is.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield for another question? I am not sure whether it has been gone over or not, but it seems to me from the reading of the bill that these bonds can be negotiated at less than par under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. The United States bonds? Yes; we are going to amend that.

Mr. BURNETT. I hope so, because I fear that certain persons might prevent the sale of them in order to beat them down and get them for less.

Mr. KITCHIN. As I said some time ago, I am sure that the committee when they reported the bill out, although they had studied the bill carefully, was of the opinion that they could not be sold below par; but after going over the bill last night I think it probable that they might be sold below par and that we ought to correct it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Having in mind the apprehension that has been expressed by several Members along the lines indicated, does not this situation remove any reasonable ground for that apprehension? Heretofore the foreign Governments have placed their loans in this country through the use or intervention of private concerns while, with respect to the transactions contemplated by this bill, nation will deal directly with nation without the intervention of a third party or a fiscal agent?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I understood the gentleman to state that all the bonds that this Government has issued were exempt from all taxes, and probably these bonds of foreign Governments would be exempt from all taxation.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think that is the custom for Governments issuing bonds to insert therein a clause exempting them from taxation.

Mr. BLACK. This act provides that these bonds shall not be exempt from inheritance or estate taxes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; inheritance and estate taxes.

Mr. BLACK. Would not it be possible for foreign Governments by means of a clause of that kind to seriously impair the sale of the bonds in the hands of the United States Government?

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will read the bill, he will see that the Secretary of the Treasury and the President shall put all the essential terms and conditions in the bond, and I presume that they will see that they will not be exempt from estate and inheritance taxes.

Mr. BLACK. Why should we not provide that they shall be exempt from all classes of taxes?

Mr. KITCHIN. If the President and the Secretary of the Treasury do not protect us in that respect, it would be perfectly legitimate and constitutional for Congress to do so. We can exempt any bonds and property from taxation or make them liable to all taxation.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. I want to ask if the gentleman does not think the language in line 11, page 2, rather loose in so important a statement. It says, "Such bonds shall not bear the circulation privilege." That is the technical language, which bankers understand, but it is not legal language. Does the Secretary of the Treasury approve this?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I had hoped that some one would ask this question, because I want information on it for my own benefit. In the title of this bill I notice the clause at the end, "and for other purposes." In lines 7 and 8, section 1, on the first page, also the language, "and other public purposes authorized by law." The idea that was in my mind was—and what I would like to be informed about is this—whether after the war is closed the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell any part of the bonds authorized by this bill to defray the current expenses of the Government, irrespective of whether they are incident to the war or not.

Mr. KITCHIN. I should say not. The language "and for other purposes" relates to section 4 of the bill—the authorization of bonds for the Panama Canal, for the construction of the Alaskan Railway, and for the Mexican situation.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does not the gentleman think that other public purposes would also include general expenditures of the Government aside from this?

Mr. KITCHIN. I should not think so.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Another question. The gentleman referred a while ago to an amendment that the committee were considering, or might consider, making this entirely a war measure. Would that cover the point I had in mind?

Mr. KITCHIN. The bonds issued under section 1; yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. So that the expenditure of the proceeds of the sale of the bonds would be limited entirely to war expenses.

Mr. KITCHIN. To the national-defense security. I think there will be no trouble about that.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I notice that the bill provides that foreign bonds shall contain essentially the same terms and conditions as the bonds of the United States Government issued under the authority of this act. One of the provisions with reference to the United States bonds provided for in this bill is the customary provision that the principal and interest shall be payable in gold coin of the United States of standard value. Does the gentleman understand that these foreign bonds shall be payable in gold coin of standard value?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; of standard value.

Mr. WINGO. Not payable in pounds sterling.

Mr. KITCHIN. Gold coin of standard value; I should say that they would make them payable in gold coin.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman thinks that would be one of the essentials.

Mr. KITCHIN. If they were paid in gold coin with the same number of grains in those coins, it would be the same thing. I think I understand what the gentleman from Arkansas means by his question, that foreign bonds must contain essentially the same terms and conditions as the bonds of the United States.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I will say I thought that; but I wanted to know if it was the gentleman's view?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I have heard the view expressed that it was not.

Mr. KITCHIN. In other words, if we loan $1,000,000,000 they have to pay us $1,000,000,000 back in gold coin.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether the question of exchange, which on so large a sum of money would be an important item, has been taken into consideration. In other words, whether the obligations of these foreign Governments which we take in exchange for our bonds will be payable in the United States or payable in London, and subject to the rate of exchange?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say that they will be payable in the United States.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am not very clear in my mind as to the extent, if any, to which this bill is an appropriation measure in addition to being an act providing for revenue. Section 1 of the bill sets forth the fact that these issues are authorized for expenditures for various purposes authorized by law. Pages 4 and 5, section 4, set forth certain purposes for which expenditures may be made, which have been heretofore authorized by law. Lines 13 and 14, page 5, contain the language—

As may be necessary to meet public expenditures on account of the Mexican situation.

Lines 18 and 19 contain the words—

Emergency naval construction or expediting naval construction.

The question in my mind is this: Does the language that I have read authorize expenditures from bond issues for the purpose of meeting our ordinary expenditures on account of the Mexican situation and for emergency naval construction and the expediting of naval construction in addition to that which has been authorized by the joint resolution referred to in the upper part of the same page? Are we simply in section 4 authorizing the use of these funds for the payment of expenditures already authorized specifically, or are we also appropriating an indefinite sum out of these bond issues to meet the expenditure of the Mexican situation, to make emergency naval construction, and for the purpose of expediting naval construction, in addition?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say that all of these are provided for and authorized in other acts. The bonds already authorized have their terms and conditions separate from the bonds authorized by this act. Section 4 is simply to make those bonds which the Secretary has been authorized to issue conform in terms and conditions to the bonds issued under the authority of this proposed act.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman thinks there is no question about that?

Mr. KITCHIN. There is no question about it in my mind.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I quite agree with what the gentleman has said with reference to that, that that is not an appropriation and is merely descriptive; but as a matter of description, ought it not to go out of the bill? Here are certain bond issues already authorized. The amount is fixed in the provision authorizing those bond issues which provided they were for certain purposes, and now this section provides that so much of those bonds already authorized that may be necessary for certain purposes may be issued under the provisions of this act. It seems to me we ought to clearly say all of those bond issues not yet issued, where we have authorized them, may be issued under the provisions of this act, so that there will be no question as to the legality of that and the total amount that may be issued.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I believe the gentleman is correct about that. I think that is useless surplusage and may perhaps raise in some gentleman's mind a doubt as to what is meant. I think it will be sufficient to just refer to the bonds authorized under the several acts which precede the descriptive language.

Mr. MANN. Simply say that the bonds not issued, already authorized, which may be issued under the provisions of these acts or resolutions, shall be issued under the terms provided for in this bill. That would cover the whole subject.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say that is correct.

Mr. MANN. Because those acts themselves show what the purpose is.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I would say that I think the suggestion offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] a very wise and proper one, because, first, it is a clearer statement of our intent; and second, because while I think the committee did not intend—and the chairman assured us the committee did not intend—to make any appropriations in section 4, yet the language I have read might in the minds of some people be held to have authorized expenditures other than those already provided by law.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am confident it would not, but I believe it is better to leave out the descriptive words and thereby make it clear, so that no one will have any doubt.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has again expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman desire any further time?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am through, if nobody desires to ask any further questions.

Mr. MANN. I will ask that the gentleman's time be extended for 30 minutes. I think possibly the gentleman may desire a little time in which to close.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am sure, so far as I am concerned, I am through. How many more gentlemen desire to ask me some more questions?

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then I will ask the gentleman to give me 10 minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois modify his request?

Mr. MANN. I will leave the request as it is, and if the gentleman does not desire to use the time he may not. I think the time has been very profitably expended so far.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from North Carolina be extended for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOWELL. Some moments ago the gentleman was discussing the negotiations in reference to the bonds of foreign governments. Heretofore loans have been negotiated by agents in this country who have received large commissions for the negotiations of those loans. Some gentlemen a moment ago suggested that these transactions would be made by one nation with the others and that agents would not take part in the negotiations. I find nothing in the bill which precludes these foreign Governments from negotiating these transactions through agents in this country.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, I imagine the agents in this country who would have charge of these negotiations would be the officials, the ambassadors of foreign Governments to our Government.

Mr. DOWELL. But should we not make provision in the bill that no commission should be paid by a foreign Government to agents in this country to negotiate these transactions that we are preparing for here to-day?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think it is not necessary. I have said several times before that we can trust the President and the Secretary of the Treasury to protect our people and the allied Governments.

Mr. DOWELL. Could there be any harm in putting such an amendment in this bill if that is the understanding of the committee?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know whether it is the understanding of the committee or not, but I would not be willing to put the language in the bill, because there might be some contracts that they have already made that are all right and some they may make hereafter that are all right. Let us leave that to the executive branch of our Government.

Mr. DOWELL. Should it not be the purpose of Congress to prevent just such contracts——

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I would rather leave that to the executive branch of our Government, which has as much interest as any of us in protecting our rights and protecting the rights of the allies.

Mr. CANNON and Mr. SMITH of Michigan rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman think there is any way by which the people who are not American citizens, and people who are, who have negotiated loans in this country before we were engaged in this war—and possibly lost money or possibly made money—is there any way that we can pass an ex post facto law to put them in the penitentiary?

Mr. KITCHIN. I should say no.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think there is as far as power is concerned, that we would have the right to put a penal provision in the bill, if we wanted to do so, forbidding American citizens from receiving any commissions growing out of any bonds issued under the provisions of this act, because no American citizen has had the right under the law heretofore to make a contract or receive commissions on money loaned by the United States to foreign Governments.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. In a second. I do not believe you can put a provision in the bill forbidding the loaning of money to a foreign Government unless the foreign Government should refuse to pay commissions. If it had a contract which it was obliged to keep, that would not be an excuse for not helping the foreign Government. I also say this because if gentlemen want to offer an amendment on that subject it seems to me the amendment should be one not affecting the issuance of the bonds and sale of the bonds, but forbidding any American citizen from accepting any commission because of the purchase by this Government of the bonds of foreign Governments.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not the gentleman think such a provision should be put in this bill?

Mr. MANN. Well, I doubt it. If there is any probability of that occasion arising it might properly be put in the bill, but if there is no such probability—and I think any contract to that effect would be void if it was made—I doubt the desirability of sticking language of that sort in the law.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. DENISON. I was going to ask the chairman of the committee with reference to section 7, which authorizes the expenditure by the Secretary of the Treasury of something over $10,000,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. Twelve million dollars.

Mr. DENISON. Under the law now in force, would the Secretary of the Treasury be required and expected to make a report of this expenditure and also report to the Congress what has been done with the proceeds of these funds and the foreign Government bonds that he had purchased?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, yes; he will make a report; yes.

Mr. DENISON. The transactions authorized here will be included under the general law requiring him to make reports?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. When will Congress be informed of what bonds have been purchased by the Secretary of the Treasury under this law?

Mr. KITCHIN. He makes a report to Congress once a year with reference to receipts and expenditures, and I suppose he will do so in this case.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Just as a matter of information I would like to inquire this: I notice in the press that it is proposed to raise $7,000,000,000. The bill authorizes the issuance of $5,000,000,000. Is it proposed that a bill will be brought right in to cover the $2,000,000,000——

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, the bill itself provides for $2,000,000,000 of certificate indebtedness to run not exceeding one year and that makes $7,000,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And the $3,000,000,000——

Mr. KITCHIN. The $3,000,000,000 of this money is going to be offset by $3,000,000,000 of bonds of foreign Governments, so we are really out, so far as the bond issue is concerned, but $2,000,000,000.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. I realize that our information on the negotiations leading up to this issue is very meager. I would like to ask the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee why $3,000,000,000 was decided upon as a loan to the allies? Why not $5,000,000,000 or $10,000,000,000? Was it an application or was it an offer?

Mr. KITCHIN. You could ask "Why not $1,000,000,000?" The administration, which is in full possession of all the facts that can be known of all the necessities of the several allies, and in full possession of all knowledge that could be obtained as to the whole situation, thinks that this is a proper amount; and that it will require in order to help us more vigorously to prosecute the war, $3,000,000,000 of money to loan or to buy the bonds of the foreign Governments.

Mr. McFADDEN. Let me ask this further question: Might we not be a little premature in fixing this amount, owing to the fact, as I understand it, that the minister of finance of England, Mr. Balfour, and the minister of finance of France are on their way here, and that probably in sitting around the table this amount may be changed?

Mr. KITCHIN. He is not bound to issue the entire amount.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In the report—and I find it is a most interesting one, and I hope the chairman will put it all in the RECORD—it says the Secretary of the Treasury at the present time has authority to issue $472,000,000 worth of bonds. And then comes a semicolon. That statement means $472,000,000 plus these other issues?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. Four hundred and seventy-two million dollars' worth is the entire amount authorized and available to be issued. Let me give you a statement of this. You now have outstanding an interest-bearing indebtedness amounting to $973,000,000. Under various acts, as set out in section 4, we authorize $472,000,000 worth of bonds. This bill would authorize $5,000,000,000 worth of bonds. There would be $6,445,000,000 worth of bonds that would be the amount of outstanding bonds of the Government when all of these bonds were issued. From that deduct $3,000,000,000 of bonds, which we will have of the foreign Governments, and it will leave $3,445,000,000 of net interest-bearing indebtedness of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. So, as a matter of fact, now $3,000,000,000 of the deal is a trade deal?

Mr. KITCHIN. The bond issue for which we will have no security will be $3,443,000,000.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. A number of inquiries have been directed to the gentleman in regard to this being a war measure, and I do not know that I fully understand the gentleman whether it is going to appear in the bill anywhere that this is a war measure and that its effect will cease upon the termination of the war.

Mr. KITCHIN. If you will notice, the title of the bill says:

To authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and to extend credit to foreign Governments—

And so forth.

Then, in section 2, which provides for extending this credit, we shall offer an amendment, which I hope will be inserted, showing that this is done in order to more effectually prosecute the war we are now engaged in.

Mr. TILSON. As the bill now reads it did not appear to me there was anything whatsoever limiting it to the war itself, and I was not clear as to the amendment the gentleman referred to.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the gentleman from North Carolina that in the questions that have been asked him to-day in most instances there seems to be great harmony and a disposition in respect to voting for the bill. But the form of the bill has been criticized, or, rather, questions have been asked in regard to it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this measure, as well as other measures to follow, called war measures, are based, as I understand it, and predicated upon the suggestion made by the President that "we bring Germany to terms and end the war," and that this loan is to carry out that suggestion or declaration. If we are lending this money to the allies of European countries simply to help them out because they are broke, then there is no affair of ours as to commissions, or anything as to the issue of the bonds; but if this money is to go, as suggested by the President, "to bring Germany to terms and end the war," then, Mr. Chairman, it is proper for us to see that this money goes with great directness to the accomplishment of the purpose, and it is up to Congress, I believe, Mr. Chairman, to see that these terms are explicit, inasmuch as there is no declaration in this bill whatever in respect to a war.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of this committee a question. It may be sensational, but nevertheless it may satisfy the minds of many Members, some of whom voted against the war resolution, and who voted conscientiously, of course. Many voted for it under protest and many voted for it with enthusiasm, but now we are all for it, and I would like to have your opinion right here now whether this bill and the provision for these vast sums of money, unheard of before in all the previous history of the nations of the earth, as to whether the money that we are preparing to appropriate is actually to be converted into implements of war for ourselves and for Europe "to bring Germany to terms and end the war," or are we just anticipating the close of the war and preparing to rehabilitate the allies following the war? In other words, is not the war about over and peace near at hand?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is my judgment, undoubtedly and unhesitatingly, that we are going to use the money that we will have and the allies are going to use the money which we will loan them to bring Germany to terms and not to help rehabilitate the allies or any other country.

Mr. FESS. In loaning money to the allies we are not designating, are we, whether it is to go to Russia or to Great Britain or to any other particular country? We will have to leave that entirely with the allied authorities?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; believing that the President will use this money to quicken the termination of the war and bring Germany to terms.

Mr. FESS. Is it thought that the President will be consulted by the allies, when they get the money, as to its use?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, I believe that the President, the head of this Government, will understand to what uses it is going to be put, of course, when he lends it. I presume they will not lend any of this money unless they know or feel that every dollar of it is going to be used in the prosecution and termination of this war.

Mr. FESS. When the allies get it the application will probably be entirely out of our hands. But at the same time it will be reasonable that the wishes of the President would be consulted? For example, we think the situation in Russia might be such that we might want to know something about how they are helping?

Mr. KITCHIN. Surely.

Mr. FESS. I have no hesitancy whatever in voting for the measure, but there are some things that might be involved that I would like to have cleared up. I presume that when the money is gone we will still be consulted in its application, although they would not be compelled to consult us.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would think that, I will say to the gentleman. Now, gentlemen of the House, I am going to ask permission——

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HELM. On page 3 it is provided—

That if any of the bonds of the United States issued and used for the purchase of such foreign obligations shall thereafter be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 3½ per cent per annum under the provisions of section 5 of this act, then and in that event the obligations of such foreign Governments held by the United States shall be, by such foreign Governments, converted in like manner and extent into obligations bearing the same rate of interest as the bonds of the United States issued under the provisions of section 5 of this act.

Is that a moral or an enforceable obligation of this act upon the foreign Government? In other words, how can this Government compel the foreign Government to act, to issue a series of bonds bearing a higher rate of interest than 3½ per cent? They are required under this act to issue their bonds at a higher rate than 3½ per cent. How can we enforce that?

Mr. KITCHIN. We have no power to enforce that, more than we can enforce the payment of any bonds. It would simply be a moral obligation on their part, as it would be a moral obligation on the part of our Government to pay its bonds. The Government will make an arrangement which will be not only a moral but a legal obligation contained in the bond itself. We could enforce payment by law if they would not pay.

Mr. HELM. Our bonds issued at 3½ per cent per annum are a legal and enforceable contract, but there is a provision in this bill requiring the other Government to change the rate of interest that their bonds shall bear.

Mr. KITCHIN. This act provides that the Secretary of the Treasury and the President must require the other Governments to make that agreement to convert their bonds.

Mr. MANN. Our bonds are not an enforceable contract.

Mr. KITCHIN. Not at all.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I realize that the situation I have in mind is not likely to arise, but nevertheless I want to ask the gentleman this question: If, in exercising this broad power, the President concludes that he can aid in bringing this war to a speedy determination by making a loan to one of the central powers not at war with us, would he have the power to do that? [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. He might really have the technical power. Of course, I will tell you one thing, that I would not so much object to it if we could spend the money to bring this war to a close and Germany to terms. I would not object.

Mr. LANGLEY. They might take the loan of a billion dollars and then quit, although I do not think that would be possible. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I yield with pleasure to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I wanted to call your attention to the matter that was answered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. It may not be necessary, but in speaking of the obligation in the contemplation of this act that these terms shall be included in whatever negotiations are made with foreign Governments——

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and therefore it would be a legal obligation.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. But not enforceable against a national sovereignty in any other way than through war?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. So that they would have to comply with that particular term as much as with any of the other terms whatever?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; it would have the same obligation in an English bond, no more and no less than if one of those Governments held our bonds. It would be the same obligation. There is no way to enforce a foreign Government to pay its bonds, if it refuses to pay, except by war.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there are no other questions, I am going to conclude by asking permission to append to my remarks the report of the committee, and I wish to ask for about three minutes to conclude the debate on this bill.

Mr. ROBBINS. Before the gentleman concludes, may I ask him a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is it not true that the limit under this bill is about $5,000,000,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. Five billion dollars of bonds and $2,000,000,000 of certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is what I understand. The bonds are to go to foreign nations?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; the proceeds from $3,000,000,000 worth of them.

Mr. ROBBINS. And the certificates of indebtedness will be used in the United States and will be immediately available?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then what does the provision at the end of page 4 mean when it says, "The bonds authorized by this section shall be in addition to the bonds authorized by section 1"? That would seem to mean additional bonds. What does that mean?

Mr. KITCHIN. With the exception of the $63,945,460 bond authorized, the bonds referred to in section 4 are bonds already authorized by law. They are not connected at all with this matter.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then why refer to them?

Mr. KITCHIN. They are not issued yet, but they are authorized to be issued. We are going to put them on the same terms of equality as the bonds issued under section 1 as to the rate of interest and the conversion privilege. Otherwise we could not sell them.

Mr. ROBBINS. In other words, you are going to increase the Alaska railroad bonds and the Shipping Board bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. They are not issued yet. We could not sell them for 3 per cent when we are going to offer $5,000,000,000 of other bonds at 3½ per cent. It is necessary.

Mr. GARNER. And they have the convertible feature.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; they have the convertible feature. Now, as I said, I would like to have three minutes before we conclude the discussion of the bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman. He is always so good-natured that I will have to yield to him.

Mr. AUSTIN. I was called out of the Chamber and have not heard all of one of the gentleman's usual able speeches. That is my misfortune.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have not made any speech to-day. I have been on the witness stand.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have no doubt the gentleman has proved to be a good witness.

Mr. KITCHIN. For my side—an interested witness.

Mr. AUSTIN. I want to ask this question: What will be the fixed interest charges, the total amount of the interest on these bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. Three and one-half per cent.

Mr. AUSTIN. What is the total amount in dollars?

Mr. KITCHIN. Can not the gentleman calculate 3½ per cent?

Mr. AUSTIN. What have we got the chairman of the committee for?

Mr. KITCHIN. To do the gentleman's sums in arithmetic?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will just sit down there now and help me out—because I have been helping him out for two hours and a half—take $5,472,000,000 and multiply it by 3½ per cent, and cut off the two ciphers, and you will have the numbers of dollars' interest which we will have to pay per year. Will the gentleman admit to this House that he does not know how to do that? If he does, I will calculate it for him; but I have not time to calculate it if he can do it. But calculating it in my head, I should say, it would be in the neighborhood of $200,000,000 a year.

Mr. GARNER. Three billion dollars of that will come back to us.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course, the interest on $3,000,000,000 of that will be paid by foreign Governments.

Mr. AUSTIN. How are we going to raise the money to pay the interest?

Mr. KITCHIN. By taxation.

Mr. AUSTIN. What form of taxation—direct taxation?

Mr. KITCHIN. The Lord only knows. There are thousands of different ways.

Mr. AUSTIN. Have not the committee considered that?

Mr. KITCHIN. We have not considered that yet. I imagine we will have to tax many articles that we never dreamed of taxing.

Mr. AUSTIN. The committee have not discussed that yet?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. I will say that before this session closes we will have to bring in by far the largest bill for additional taxation ever presented to any legislative body on earth.

Mr. AUSTIN. Has the gentleman any prejudice against raising some of that money, at least, by increasing the tariff dues?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, I am not going to talk tariff to the gentleman now. Wait until the war is over and then we will talk tariff.

Mr. SABATH. You will not forget to see that Tennessee pays her share.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no; Tennessee will pay her share. Now, gentlemen, I thank you for asking me so many questions and keeping your patience with me. [Applause.]

The report upon the bill above referred to is as follows:

[House of Representatives, Rept. No. 3, 65th Cong., 1st sess.]

Mr. KITCHIN, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2762) to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and to extend credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes, having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House without amendment and recommend that the bill do pass.

The proposed bill authorizes a bond issue of $5,000,000,000. It provides that not to exceed $3,000,000,000 from the proceeds of these bonds may be used in extending credits to foreign Governments. The remaining $2,000,000,000 is to be used in meeting expenditures authorized for the national security and defense.

The bill also authorizes an additional bond issue not to exceed $63,945,460 to redeem the 3 per cent loan of 1908 to 1918, maturing August 1, 1918. The remaining bonds specified in section 4 of the bill are already authorized by law.

The bill also authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue $2,000,000,000 worth of certificates of indebtedness, payable within one year from the date of issue.

Your committee deem it advisable to authorize the $5,000,000,000 bond issue at this time in order to enable our Government to extend liberal credits and in order to provide immediately ample funds to meet such expenditures as are authorized for the national security and defense.

The bill provides that the rate of interest shall not exceed 3½ per cent per annum, and leaves the terms and denominations of the bonds to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

If at any time prior to December 31, 1918, a subsequent series of bonds are issued at a rate of interest in excess of 3½ per cent per annum, the bill provides that the bonds issued under authority of this act may be convertible at the option of the holder into bonds bearing the higher rate of interest.

This bill also authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the remaining bonds still available to be issued under the Panama Canal bond provision of section 39 of the revenue act of August 5, 1909; the bonds authorized for the construction of the nitrate plant in section 124 of the national-defense act of June 3, 1916; the bonds authorized under section 13 of the shipping act of September 7, 1916; the bonds authorized under section 400 of the revenue act of March 3, 1917; and those authorized under the public resolution of March 4, 1917, bearing interest at not to exceed 3½ per cent per annum and subject to the conversion privilege should a subsequent series of bonds be issued prior to December 31, 1918, bearing a higher rate of interest.

The Secretary of the Treasury at the present time has authority to issue $472,000,000 worth of bonds; $222,000,000 worth are still available to be issued under the Panama Canal bond provision of the revenue act of August 5, 1909. The revenue act of March 3, 1917, authorizes the issue of $100,000,000 worth and the public resolution of March 4, 1917, authorizes the issue of $150,000,000 worth. The national-defense act authorizes the issue of Panama Canal bonds for the construction of the nitrate plant. The shipping act likewise authorizes the issue of Panama Canal bonds for the purposes of that act.

The bill as heretofore stated authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to extend credits not to exceed $3,000,000,000 to foreign Governments. It authorizes the purchase with the proceeds from the sale of these bonds, by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, of the obligations of foreign Governments bearing the same rate of interest and containing essentially the same terms and conditions as the bonds issued under authority of this act. It provides, however, that should any of the bonds of the United States issued and used for the purchase of such foreign obligations, be converted into United States bonds bearing a rate of interest higher than 3½ per cent, that in that event the obligations of the foreign Governments held by the United States shall be converted into obligations bearing the same rate of interest as the like bonds of the United States. It will, therefore, be observed that the $3,000,000,000 credit proposed to be extended to foreign Governments will take care of itself and will not constitute an indebtedness that will have to be met by taxation in the future.

In view of the fact that a very large portion of the taxes now levied and proposed to be levied at a future date will be payable yearly, and therefore will not be capable of yielding a continual flow of revenue into the Treasury, your committee deem it advisable to recommend the authorization of the issuance of $2,000,000,000 worth of certificates of indebtedness, payable within one year, to the end that the Treasury may at all times have ample means of securing funds to meet the immediate needs of the Government.

The total interest-bearing debt outstanding February 28, 1917, amounted to $973,000,000. Under existing law $472,000,000 worth of bonds are available to be issued. This bill authorizes, in addition to the bonds already available to be issued under existing law and exclusive of the $3,000,000,000 bond issue to extend credit to foreign Governments which takes care of itself, the issue of $2,000,000,000 worth of bonds. Should this amount of bonds be issued the total interest-bearing indebtedness, exclusive of the $3,000,000,000 credit to foreign Governments, will amount to $3,445,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] is recognized for one hour. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, as a general proposition I am opposed to issuing Government bonds for the purpose of raising money to pay the ordinary running expenses of the Government. I am going to vote for this bill for reasons which I will state. It is an unusual situation to find in this House Democrats and Republicans in the same bed.

Mr. GARNER. Especially in revenue matters.

Mr. FORDNEY. Especially on the question of raising revenue for the running expenses of the Government; but the conditions confronting the people of this country at this time are unusual. We are at war with Germany, or likely to go to war with Germany. I hope that no American soldier may find it necessary to cross the ocean to fight in Europe during this war. [Applause.] I believe that England and France and their allies in this war need money and supplies to-day more than they need men. [Applause.] I hope that most of the money that it is proposed by this Government to loan to England, France, and their allies in this war will be spent in this country. I believe it unwise for the Congress of the United States to attempt to say where those European nations shall spend that money or how they shall spend it. If we are to aid those nations in this great struggle, I believe we should give them a free hand in the use of this money that we propose to loan to them. [Applause.]

As has been said here, no authorization for the raising of such an immense sum of money has ever been presented in any legislative body in the world before, and it is my purpose to attempt to show to the gentlemen of this House just what this means to the American people in the way of taxes. We should understand that, and we should proceed with our eyes open, realizing fully the obligations we are imposing on the people.

Prior to the last session of Congress the national debt of this country was $973,000,000. There were outstanding prior to last December $682,284,000 of Government bonds bearing interest at 2 per cent. There were $10,039,000 in round numbers of bonds bearing interest at 2½ per cent per annum. There were outstanding $162,542,000 bearing a rate of interest at 3 per cent per annum, and $118,489,000 of Government bonds bearing interest at 4 per cent per annum.

The total interest-bearing debt of this Nation then required about $23,512,000 annual interest to be paid by our people. Our public debt at that time amounted to $9.73 per capita, based on a population of 100,000,000.

The authorization of the bond issue at the last session of Congress (together with the Panama bonds then undisposed of—$240,000,000) increased the interest-bearing debt of the people $7.90 per capita. The bonded indebtedness proposed in this bill will place upon the people an additional debt of $70 per capita, or a total of $87.63 per capita, the interest upon which indebtedness must be paid annually by the American people at the rate of interest provided for, if all the bonds authorized by this bill are issued.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is not the gentleman in error to the extent of $2,000,000,000, and is not the added per capita debt $50 instead of $70, because $2,000,000,000 are to be in the shape of Treasury notes to be taken up at the end of a year?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will explain to the House how it is proposed to take care of the payment of these certificates of indebtedness. I stated that if all these bonds were disposed of, to bear 3½ per cent——

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman also made the statement that it would be an annual tax against the people.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Whereas the Government will not have to continue to pay interest on the $2,000,000,000 certificates, because they will be taken up at the end of a year with the money in the Treasury.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman will permit, I will explain how it is proposed to take care of that matter. But, gentlemen, prior to the war in Europe I looked up the public debt of the principal nations of the world. I call attention to this in order to prepare your minds for what we must be ready to meet. I found that our public debt was less per capita than that of any great nation in the world by far. Germany came next. Our public debt at that time was a little less than $12 per capita. Germany's public debt was more than $13 per capita, and the public debt of Great Britain was the highest of any country in the world prior to the war. It was $36 per capita. Great Britain owed more money in proportion to her population than any nation in the world.

If we engage in this war and prosecute it for any length of time, we are going to spend all the money authorized here to-day. I hope we do not. I do not understand that it is the intention of the Government to spend one dollar more than is absolutely necessary; and while I do not agree politically with the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, I want to say that I have every confidence in their honesty to spend this money in the most judicious manner that their judgment will permit. [Applause.] I have faith in the honesty and good faith of the people of this country. [Applause.]

Prior to four years ago the largest sum of money ever appropriated for one year's expenses for the running of this Government was $1,100,000,000, or $11 per capita. It is proposed, and I believe that the proposition will be carried out, to raise additional money by direct taxes on the people before this session of Congress adjourns, and to raise a sum in round numbers amounting to $1,750,000,000 in the next 12 months in addition to existing revenue laws.

These certificates of indebtedness it is proposed to authorize and offer for sale are for the purpose of enabling the Government at this time to get ready money to carry it along until such time as the additional taxes can be raised which I have just mentioned. Now, I think that answers the question of the gentleman from Texas.

When the money is raised and there is sufficient money in the Treasury of the United States to retire these certificates of indebtedness they will be retired. At the last session of Congress, in what was known as the excess profits tax law, there was an authorization of $300,000,000 of certificates of indebtedness, all of which shall be paid within 12 months of the date of their issue. The Secretary of the Treasury has already sold $50,000,000 of these certificates at a rate of interest of 2 per cent. They were issued for a period of 90 days, and are to be redeemed, I believe, in June or July next with the moneys expected to be collected from individual incomes and corporation taxes due in June. It is proposed to retire that $50,000,000 of certificates of indebtedness at that time.

Let me show you where we have gone in the bond issue and authorization of bonds in this country. It is proposed that the $240,000,000, or the most of that sum, of Panama Canal bonds issued recently are either to be disposed of or are outstanding now.

Congress authorized in what is called the excess profits tax law passed at the last session of Congress $100,000,000 of long-time bonds, and, as I have said, $300,000,000 of certificates of indebtedness. It was proposed to use that money in strengthening our Army and Navy. Later, on the 4th of March, we passed a bond issue of $150,000,000 additional long-time bonds. It was suggested that this money is needed to meet the necessary expenses in building up our Navy and recruiting our Army, and for the payment of bills created by sending our troops down to the border last year. So that when we adjourned Congress on the 4th of March we had authorized the issuance and sale of $790,569,000 of Government bonds in addition to the revenues to be raised from direct taxes this year.

Let me tell you what the revenues are estimated to be. It is estimated that from all sources as provided for by law during the last session of Congress we will collect $995,000,000. In addition to that it is estimated that we will collect about $325,000,000 from postal receipts, and the excess profits tax law passed at the last session of Congress will yield, according to estimates, in round numbers, $250,000,000; in all, the revenues of this Government under existing laws from direct taxes this year will be $1,570,000,000. In addition to that it is now proposed, as I have stated, to enact additional internal-revenue laws, and it has been whispered about that it is possible at this session of Congress there may be some legislation placing an additional import duty on certain articles coming from foreign countries which are not competitive products and on which a duty could be arranged without making it necessary to have hearings on a tariff bill—namely, articles of antiquity, crude rubber, and so forth.

But if we impose a duty on raw rubber, so called, we must then arrange a compensatory duty on manufactured rubber, and that will necessitate hearings, so that the compensatory duty may be equitably adjusted in the law to fit particular cases, the cost of conversion. But if we do pass additional internal-revenue laws at this session to raise an additional $1,750,000,000, then during the next fiscal year, according to the estimates, we will raise in direct taxes from the people $3,320,000,000, or $33.20 per capita. That is a large sum of money, gentlemen, to be raised from the people of this country in any one year.

It is my belief, and it has been my aim, that the expenses of this great war in which we are about to engage should not be imposed upon the people within the next 12 months; that a great portion of it should be spread over the future; that the future generations that may enjoy the maintenance of this Government by the efforts of men living to-day should pay their share, or a fair portion, of that money. [Applause.] In addition to the bonded indebtedness which I have mentioned, this proposition is now to issue $7,000,000,000 of bonds. Seven billion dollars' worth of bonds added to the amount of bonds already authorized and direct taxes to be collected next year totals a sum of $11,110,000,000. Whoever heard of any nation under God's sun having outstanding over $8,700,000,000 of Government bonds that were not issued because of some great conflict with some other nation of the earth? It is true that we propose to loan to foreign Governments $3,000,000,000 of this money and to take in exchange bonds of the Governments to which we loan that money, and take their bonds at a rate of interest at which we can borrow that money from our people in this country without profit to us—a most magnanimous proposition, and it meets my approval.

I am glad to see such a provision go into law. We are not loaning this money as an investment; it is not proposed that we shall loan this money to foreign Governments for any other purpose than to aid them in fighting our battles; no profit expected.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, I intend to vote for this bill, but if what the gentleman states is true I think it ought to be amended in one particular. I understand that this country holds at the present time—or that the people in the country do—between one and two thousand million dollars' worth of foreign bonds that have been accepted in exchange for munitions of war and foodstuffs supplied to the allies; that we have accepted those bonds at a discount of from 10 to 25 per cent; and that they are underwritten by American securities, most of them held in American banks. Is there anything in this bill that would prohibit a foreign Government, one of the allies, from issuing 3½ per cent bonds, sending them to the United States and getting the money for them, and taking up the depreciated bonds at par, releasing the American securities, and practically making a present of $150,000,000 to $250,000,000 to the banks?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, let me say to the gentleman that the Governments of England, France, Germany, Russia, and all of the Governments in Europe at war are in a life-and-death struggle, fighting for their existence, and it will be my purpose in loaning this money to the nations we propose to join, and with whom we propose to cooperate to end this frightful war, to let them have the money and use it to the very best advantage for themselves, whether that be to buy food supplies in this country or arms and ammunition or to save their credit at home. So long as the people engaged in that great war get that money into their possession, I have every confidence and belief that they will expend it to their very best advantage in bringing this war to a successful close. [Applause.] I know of no set of sane men who would do otherwise.

Mr. CURRY. Possibly not. I am willing to vote $3,000,000,000 or $5,000,000,000 or $7,000,000,000 for future credit or for the use of the foreign nations to pay their armies in the future, but I am not willing to vote a profit of $150,000,000 to $250,000,000 into the banks of the United States and Great Britain and Germany simply by the foreign Government issuing a 3½ per cent bond, getting the money from the United States, and retiring the depreciated bonds already in circulation, already used, and already in the hands of the banks. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. I agree with the gentleman, and I have no idea that such a proposition is in the mind of any man in Europe.

Mr. CURRY. Why does not the committee present that in the bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. My idea is that those people are much in need of money to prosecute this war. There is no other object on the face of the earth in the minds of the American people in loaning European nations this money. Their only purpose is to aid them in the best way possible to fight our battle across the sea without calling upon our men to go there. I do not believe that one single dollar of the money to be loaned to them as provided for by this bill will ever be used for the purpose suggested by the gentleman; if so, I would like to see some provision of law that would prevent it, because if they were to borrow this money from us and then retire outstanding bonds, what they would have to do when in need of money would be to come again and sell their own bonds at a higher rate of interest than they are getting this money from us for, a thing not at all likely to be done by them.

Mr. CURRY. I do not think this bill should be amended from the floor; I want to vote for it just as it comes from the committee, and if that is the opinion of the committee, why does it not amend the bill so as to prevent the possibility of any such thing happening?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, let me say to the gentleman that this bill was presented to the Committee on Ways and Means. Republican members were called in. Mr. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, appeared before the committee and for three hours explained the purpose of the law to the committee, and satisfied me that he meant everything he said.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Assuming that there might be something in what the gentleman from California suggests, does the gentleman see any way by which this bill could be amended to cover his point that would not infringe upon the rights of a foreign nation to do as it pleased with its own property?

Mr. FORDNEY. I would say this: I am not a lawyer and I have no prejudice against lawyers, but I wish half the men in this House were business men and not lawyers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman submit to another question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have seldom, if ever, seen a will drawn by a lawyer that did not complicate the wishes of the deceased.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman submit to a further question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The proposition is that the United States issue bonds and from the proceeds of the sale thereof purchase certain foreign bonds issued in corresponding terms. If there has been any depreciation in prior issues of foreign bonds, can the United States suffer?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, it has been explained over and over again by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that these bonds when issued are to be sold for the purpose of obtaining money to be loaned to the foreign Governments, and that the bonds to be accepted by the United States Government for that money shall be essentially and exactly the same in every respect as our bonds and contain every feature as to the amount, the time of payment, the rate of interest, and every condition imaginable set forth in their bonds to conform to our bonds so that the payments of the foreign bonds will come due at the same time our bonds come due, and the interest payable at the same time, so that the rate of interest collected from the foreign Government shall be the same amount, payable at the same time, that we may have that money to meet the payment of the interest on our bonds.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman stated that he believed that this money ought to be used and given to foreign Governments to fight our battles for us, and yet the language of the bill is that this money may be loaned to any foreign nation whether they are fighting battles against Germany or not. Does not the gentleman believe that ought to be stated in the bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. That question came up in the committee and it was explained in this way so that it satisfied me, that would not be a wise provision to go in the law. Here is England, France, Russia, Italy, Serbia, Montenegro, Roumania, and Belgium, in Europe, and Japan in the Orient, at war with Germany and her allies. The Lord only knows how many more nations may come into this great conflict before it is ended.

Mr. LANGLEY. There are not many more left.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes; quite a good many. It was not thought wise to designate the particular nations or governments in Europe to which this money should be loaned lest we might make a mistake. It might not be necessary to loan any of this money to one of these great nations, or to several of them, whereas others might need it. Now—if the gentleman will pardon me—it was stated by the Secretary of the Treasury that because of the new form of government in Russia at this time this new Government is in sore straits financially. It is hard for them to obtain money under the circumstances, and it would be quite likely that Russia would call upon us for a large portion of this money, agreeable perhaps to the other allied nations. Therefore it was not thought wise that the Governments to which this money is to be loaned should be mentioned in the law. Now, if the House thinks it wise—and I will accept its judgment against my own—I shall be satisfied to have such a provision go in the law.

Mr. TOWNER. It would not be necessary to state it except in general terms. Does the gentleman believe we can trust more safely the Secretary of the Treasury to determine what nations and the amount and on what terms this money should be paid than the Congress of the United States?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me say to my friend that if Congress put the exact provisions in the law by which that money could be loaned we do it with the conditions existing to-day, but what conditions might arise to-morrow the Congress of the United States does not know, and we ought to have some confidence in the administration, or turn it out of office. That might be a thing agreeable to some of us, of course.

Mr. TOWNER. Does not the gentleman believe that for that very reason it is unwise for us to say that we place $3,000,000,000 in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury to loan to any nation that he may determine without the Congress of the United States determining whether that particular loan is wise or unwise.

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, there are two sides to that question, and there is much wisdom in the gentleman's statement. But do you think for one minute Holland, not being at war with Germany, Spain not being at war with Germany, Switzerland not being at war with Germany, China not being at war with Germany, that if the Secretary of the Treasury loaned some of this money to one of these countries to-morrow why he would be turned out of office in 15 minutes and I would help to do it. Does not the the gentleman think that is reasonable, too?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not know about his being turned out of office, I have not seen any indication so far.

Mr. FORDNEY. I would like to see it done if he did anything of that kind.

Mr. TOWNER. One more question; if the gentleman will be kind enough to yield to me.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. There is no statement in the bill that any of this money is to be used for the prosecution of the war. It may be loaned to the nations for any purpose whatever. Does not the gentleman believe that, at least, he ought to state in this bill that it is to be used for the prosecution of the war?

Mr. FORDNEY. I believe if the gentleman from Iowa were Secretary of the Treasury, knowing him as I do, I would have confidence in him not to expend Uncle Sam's money except for the best interests of the American people, and I would place confidence in him.

The responsibility rests on the administration. I believe the administration will spend this money as best they know how. If we can point out to them any better way, any more enlightened path than the one which they are on, let us do it. I do not know that we can help them more by throwing around them restrictions and penalties than by giving them a free hand to do the best they can under the circumstances.

Mr. TOWNER. Just one more question. Does not the gentleman believe that, when we are to give this money for the prosecution of this war, understanding it shall be used by the nations in the prosecution of the war, at least we should say in this bill that that money should be loaned to them for that purpose and none other?

Mr. FORDNEY. It is very possible that would be best, but I do not think so. I thought the language was broad, and yet specific, after all, as to the intention of the administration as to what use ought to be made of this money.

Mr. GARDNER. In the first place, I think the gentleman from Iowa has overlooked the fact that, although they speak of the Secretary of the Treasury continually, these loans are to be made subject to the approval of the President.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Would it not be a very good purpose to put some of this money to, if cases should arise, to loan it to Turkey, for instance, on condition that they should get out of the war?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, my good friend, I would be ready to vote for a very reasonable appropriation to be given the Kaiser if he would hie away to the woods and stop this awful war.

Mr. MONDELL. I understood the gentleman from North Carolina to say in answer to a question that he personally had no objection to an amendment which would limit these loans to nations at war with Germany.

Mr. FORDNEY. Neither have I.

Mr. MONDELL. It occurs to me that would be a very wise amendment, to which might wisely be added a further amendment that these loans were to occur only while we were at war with Germany.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman from Wyoming does not think for a minute the Secretary of the Treasury would issue those bonds and loan the money to European countries after the war is over? If you do, you have a different idea about human nature and mankind than I.

Mr. MONDELL. If the entire matter is to be left to the Secretary without any condition, why have any conditions at all if you want to leave it entirely with the Secretary?

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman stated that the $2,000,000,000 of bonds authorized for expenditure by the Government would be expended only as needed. Can the gentleman inform the committee whether the $3,000,000,000 of bonds authorized as a loan to foreign Governments will be expended forthwith?

Mr. FORDNEY. It was, as I remember it, the Secretary's opinion that foreign countries would call for some of this money very shortly. In other words, they would call for credit here; that they are sorely in need of money, of credit, and especially such credit as we can give them at this rate of interest.

Mr. STAFFORD. If it is not violating the confidence of the Secretary of the Treasury given to the members of the committee——

Mr. FORDNEY. It is no secret.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to inquire how the Secretary of the Treasury arrived at the enormous amount of $3,000,000,000 for loans to the foreign Governments? The newspapers carried the information two weeks before we assembled here to pass on the war resolution that it was the policy of the administration to recommend a loan of $3,000,000,000 for reloaning to the belligerent powers at war with Germany. I should like to inquire how that sum was arrived at?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it a mere guess?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know whether it is or not. I do not know that the Secretary of the Treasury brought out that point, but it is thought that those European nations will call immediately for all the credit they can get here. They are like myself; their credit is strained. I know what it means when I go to a bank. When I have good collateral and go to a bank to borrow money, I dictate the rate of interest I pay. When I go to the bank and want to borrow money, without first-class collateral, the banker dictates the rate of interest I pay, and he is not at all mild about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Nothing has been furnished to the committee about what amounts will be loaned to the respective nations under this $3,000,000,000 authorization?

Mr. FORDNEY. No. The Secretary stated one Government might ask for considerably more than another, and he will call the representatives of those Governments together and talk the matter over, and then decide upon the amount to be loaned and the length of time they wish to borrow that money, and the conditions to be set forth in their bonds to comply with the conditions to be set forth in our bonds.

Mr. SLOAN. Touching the stability and burden of making these loans, would the gentleman approve of an amendment like this in section 2?—

That for the purpose of establishing credits in the United States for foreign Governments, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, after he has been advised by the Speaker and the minority leader of the House of Representatives and the President pro tempore and the minority leader of the Senate.

Does the gentleman approve of such an amendment as that as I have it prepared?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know but that would help it—offhand. I do not like to jump at conclusions quickly. This is a very serious matter to the people of the United States, because once the obligation is put upon us we will be called upon to pay it. Pay day comes around. Oh, men say, 90 days is a long time. Well, just give your note for 90 days and see how quickly time passes. When once these bonds are issued then a pay day is fixed and we will be called to account, my friends, for our work here to-day. Those bonds must be paid, and will be paid.

We are a great and rich Nation. Let me point out briefly to you, gentlemen: When the Civil War broke out in 1860 there were, in round numbers, 31,000,000 people in the United States. Ten million of this number were south of the Mason and Dixon line, none of whom contributed in the way of direct taxation to the prosecution of the war in the North. Twenty-one million people, in round numbers, supported the war in the North, and there was placed upon the people of this country an income-tax law very shortly after the declaration of war, or within a few months, which provided that all incomes above $800 and below $5,000 should pay a tax of 5 per cent, and all incomes above $5,000 should pay a tax of 10 per cent.

In 1862 or 1863 the exemption was lowered to $600, and incomes between $600 and $5,000 paid an income tax of 5 per cent. The high rate of 10 per cent was not changed. The first full year for which those taxes were paid the people of the North—21,000,000—contributed in income taxes $72,000,000, a sum greater than was collected in this country last year by our present income-tax law. And directly after the war that limitation, that exemption, was raised to $1,000 and then to $2,000, and immediately those taxes were cut in two, and instead of raising $72,000,000 some $34,000,000 was collected. That exemption, that difference, between $600 and $2,000 cut the total revenue squarely in two. And for the purpose of raising money to carry on this war I am ready and willing to lower the exemption in the present income-tax law to $1,500 and $2,500, and we will thereby double the income taxes collected. [Applause.]

And, again, we must call upon our people for a large sum of money in addition to existing taxes. One billion five hundred and seventy million dollars is a large sum of money, but that is the amount we are raising now, and if we are called upon for more than double that we must look around for other sources of revenue. I know of no more equitable, just, and easy way to raise a very large portion of that money than to provide for a 3-cent instead of a 2-cent postage on first-class mail matter, and double or treble, if necessary quadruple, the postage rates on second-class mail matter, because the postage paid by the great newspapers and magazines of this country have never paid more than about one-eighth of the expense to this Government for handling their products.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Just let me conclude that sentence, and then I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Very well.

Mr. FORDNEY. The Postmaster General's report a few years ago showed that the great magazines of this country were carried in our mails, one class a thousand miles from the point of mailing to the point of delivery, and another class about 1,100 or 1,150 miles, and the great metropolitan newspapers were carried an average distance of 300 miles from the point of publication; and on that class of mail matter the Government received 1¼ cents a pound in postage, and the cost to this Government was 9¼ cents, a loss of 8 cents to the Government on every pound mailed. During that year there was a profit in the postal receipts of more than $53,000,000 on first-class mail matter and a loss to the Government of some $64,000,000 on second-class mail matter.

Gentlemen, I favor putting an equitable and just rate of tax upon the newspapers that have done more through their columns to bring on this war than any other one power in the country. [Applause.] There is little that the Congress of the United States could have done to benefit the great metropolitan newspapers and the magazines to yield them more income than to declare war, and why should they not pay a just and equitable rate of postage to help out this great tax upon the people.

Now, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the gentleman has answered the question I was going to ask.

Mr. FORDNEY. Thank you.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Certainly.

Mr. AUSTIN. When the gentleman stated he favored the increase of postage on first-class mail matter, did he mean to increase the rate on letter postage?

Mr. FORDNEY. I mean to increase the rate of postage on first-class mail matter that now pays 2 cents. I mean to increase it to 3 cents, and it will yield us $140,000,000 additional revenue annually. The newspapers and the magazines of the country, for second and third class mail matter, paid into the Treasury of the United States $20,000,000 last year. Why should not they pay a little more? I am only suggesting this. I am only offering suggestions now. You will always find me working in harmony with the majority of my party, and I will go hand in hand with whatever the majority of my party here decides upon. But I believe this is the way to get a certain portion of our money now needed.

Another way would be to increase our internal-revenue taxes. Last year we collected from fermented liquors—beer—$87,000,000, gentlemen. I did not drink my share of it. [Laughter.] We collected $140,000,000 in taxes on strong liquors—whiskies and brandies. We collected $512,000,000 from all sources by the internal-revenue taxes. We can increase our internal-revenue taxes without distressing anybody. It would be my purpose to put a tax upon theater tickets, baseball tickets, races, picture shows, and a great many of those things. Everything in the shape of amusement can afford to pay a little more tax to help out in this great crisis, gentlemen, and I know of no one who should be more willing to contribute than the one seeking amusement. Prepare yourselves for it; because it is coming into this House in a few days—an internal-revenue measure to raise a billion and three quarters in addition to the amount already raised.

I mention it so that you may get ready for the question. It will not be my bill. I will not have the honor to prepare that bill. Our beloved friends with whom we are cooperating and going hand in hand on the floor of the House will prepare that bill.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the newspapers are responsible for bringing on this war, and that they advocated war for the purpose of increasing their income?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I did not say that; not at all. The gentleman misunderstood me. I said—and I repeat it—that the publications through the newspapers of the country contributed more to bring on the war than anything else.

Mr. PLATT. The newspapers were upholding the Government. The gentleman does not mean they advocated the war for profit, does he?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will let you be the judge of that. They advocated war, did they not?

Mr. PLATT. The newspapers gave the people information, stated what the Government was standing for, and in some cases urged the administration to stand firm.

Mr. FORDNEY. In some cases they gave us misinformation. [Laughter.]

Mr. PLATT. I do not think they have given misinformation purposely. If misinformation was given, in most cases it came from sources that they were not responsible for.

Mr. FORDNEY. Anyway, there was some fellow down at El Paso, Tex., on the border, who sent messages here frequently to the effect that a great many of our men were being killed, and that Villa was crossing the border line with a great force, and nobody was able to tell where he was the next day. The newspapers were issuing extras every few hours, and we had 20,000 men down in Mexico, and they were within 60 miles of Villa, and the War Department sent orders down to our soldiers "Do not go one step nearer," and that they could not find Villa, and so on, and so forth. Is not that true?

Mr. LANGLEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I bought five different extras on five different days announcing the death of Villa.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I think you are stating facts.

Mr. PLATT. The publication of the Zimmermann note in regard to Mexico had a good deal to do with arousing the American people to a realization of what Germany was trying to do to the United States. The gentleman would not say that the newspapers ought not to publish such things because they might bring on war, would he?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know whether one-tenth of what is said in the newspapers is correct or incorrect. I do not know whether anybody else knows, but I do know that in the last 12 months I have not read a paper that discouraged going to war with Germany, not one. They were all prodding us on, encouraging the administration and the people to declare war against Germany because our rights on the seas had been encroached upon. We are in that mix-up now, and we can not wade across the sea. Neither can the newspapers send us over there. It must be the bone and sinew of this Nation and the money and brains and blood of the Nation that must go over there and fight this war, not the newspapers. Now, all I am asking is that they pay their fair share of the tax that is going to be imposed on the people. [Applause.]

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman did not read the newspapers published by William R. Hearst all over the United States, which were in favor of surrendering every American right so that we would not get into war, did he?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I never agreed with William R. Hearst, politically or otherwise. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman has referred to the debate being largely conducted by lawyers of the House, but it happens that the gentleman and myself are not lawyers, but are just plain, ordinary business men. I agree that the money desired to be raised can readily be secured by the means the gentleman from Michigan has suggested. There is no trouble about raising the money. But inasmuch as the President has called upon the Congress and the country to support him in his declaration that we should "bring Germany to terms and then have peace," what objection is there to stating that purpose in this bill? I ask you, as a straight business man across the table, if the definite and specific purpose of this war is to crush Germany, why is it that you and others object to stating that? I do not believe, from my study of history, that any war has ever been conducted in which Governments raising money have not fallen a prey to the money sharks, who have been referred to here to-day. I would therefore be glad to see this war different from other wars with respect to the commonly alleged rotten financial methods. If this is to be a war for human liberty and democracy and "to bring Germany to terms," why not so state, and let us fight for that objective?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will say to my good friend, whom I love as I do a brother, no man on the face of this earth regrets more than I do that we felt obliged to go to war with Germany. Germans are among the best people of the world and among the best citizens of the United States. I believe there are few congressional districts in this country which have a greater percentage of German people than the district I have the honor to represent. They are my friends. There are no better people in the world. I regret that we have been obliged to go to war with the people of their fatherland. But I voted for the resolution because of conditions that had been brought about, which made me feel there was no other course for me to follow. I am ready and willing to join with you in amending this bill to meet your views, provided the amendment meets with the approval of the committee. I have no objection, except that possibly it might be a mistake to tie the hands of the administration; but if a majority favor the amendment I will willingly join with you. Let us amend it so as to have it in the best form possible. I am with you on that point. Do not misunderstand me. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, I have taken too much time. My hour is up.

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FORDNEY. May I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have heard the gentleman suggest different methods of taxation in order to meet this emergency.

Mr. FORDNEY. I offer them only as a suggestion.

Mr. AUSTIN. What have you said in reference to increasing the tariff duties, and also to putting a duty on a large number of articles which are now on the free list, and which articles are manufactured in this country? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. If the House will bear with me just a moment, I will answer that question. Personally I am exceedingly anxious to increase our tariff duties and to raise a large portion of this money in that way. I realize, as my Democratic friends do, and as they are now ready to admit, that the Underwood tariff law as a revenue producer is a failure. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, my friends, I do not believe that we ought to take up at this session of Congress any legislation except that which pertains directly to this war and the things for which we have been called here. Of course, if we were to increase our rates of duty by a tariff law we could raise a very large additional sum of money without placing a burden upon the people. But let me say, gentlemen, from my experience on the Committee on Ways and Means, where such legislation originates, I believe that in order to prepare a tariff law equitably, justly, and fairly, and to put into that law the various compensatory rates of duty, at least three months' hearings before the committee would be required, so that the people who have their money invested in the great industries of this country and representatives of the consumers might come before our committee and be heard as to the rates to be placed in the law. And after hearings were had, in order to prepare that law in a sane and sensible manner it would require at least an additional two months of work by the committee. That would be five months, and I do not believe any bill could be wisely or correctly framed in less time.

And at the present, when the whole world is in an uproar and prices are abnormal at home and abroad, both for labor and for products of every description, agricultural and manufactured, it is no opportune time, gentlemen, to establish tariff rates and have them correct and do it quickly. [Applause.] It could not be done by the best talent in the world and be done right. At the earliest possible moment—and I believe that time will come in December next—I want this Congress to take up the question of a revision of our tariff laws and more correctly adjust those rates than they are in existing law. I believe we can get along until December next without bringing that kind of legislation before us, as much as I would like to see it done to-morrow.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman's word goes a great ways among the people in my district. That is the reason I ask this question: Does he really believe that we will take up the tariff question in December, or at the next session; and does he believe that there is any chance in this Congress of getting an increase of rates in the direction of protection? That is what my people are for.

Mr. FORDNEY. I think we can; and for this reason: Several of my Democratic friends—and I hope they are all my friends—on that side of the House have said to me that they must concede that the Underwood tariff law as a revenue producer is a failure, and that while they have always stood for tariff for revenue only, they are ready to eliminate that word "only" and pass a law and put in that law such rates as will raise the greatest amount of revenue and call it a tariff for revenue. When that is done, gentlemen, you will have an old-time, dyed-in-the-wool Republican tariff law. [Applause.] I am ready to join with you any time in framing a law of that kind.

Mr. CANTRILL. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. My time has nearly expired, but I will answer the question briefly if I can.

Mr. CANTRILL. If the Payne-Aldrich tariff law was on the statute books to-day, does the gentleman think that it would raise sufficient revenue to meet the extraordinary demands now made by the war?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; but I will tell you what it would do. Up to the 1st of last January—and I have not figured the difference since that time—up to the 1st of January last the Underwood tariff law had been on the statute books a little over two years. The difference between the amount of money raised under that law and the amount that would have been raised had the Payne rates of duty been in effect, with the same amount of imports, would be $520,000,000 more than has been collected. [Applause.] You are going to collect this fiscal year in customs receipts about the same amount of money collected last year—$210,000,000. Two hundred and ten million dollars on an ad valorem of 9½ per cent on all imports, free and dutiable, and if we had the Payne rates, which were 19½ per cent ad valorem during the life of that law, you can see what we would have raised. We would have raised about $450,000,000 annually instead of $210,000,000.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. If the Committee on Ways and Means reports a bill to raise the necessary amount of money to run the Government and does that by direct taxation and increase of the income tax, postage tax, internal-revenue tax—if we raise a sufficient amount—does the gentleman expect to get the Ways and Means Committee next winter to increase the duties when we are already collecting a sufficient amount of money to run the Government?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will tell you what we would do if the majority were on this side of the House. What they will do, I do not know; but I believe that there are gentlemen on that side of the House who will join us at the next session of Congress and pass a tariff law. Whether it will be a nonpartisan law like the nonpartisan tariff board, I do not know. [Laughter.] But that is a joke.

Mr. AUSTIN. Why not make the issue now and submit it to the other side whether we will increase the tariff duties and put on the dutiable list a large free list, and make the foreigners who are enjoying the American market help pay some of these expenses rather than take it all out of our people?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am ready to do it if we do not have to stay here all summer. I believe that the best thing for the Congress of the United States to do is to do what the administration is anxious for it to do and to adjourn and go home. [Applause.]

Mr. LANGLEY. Does the gentleman think that when that is done, when the new tariff law is passed, that the cost of living will be any higher than it is now?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, my Democratic friends in their Baltimore platform criticized Republicans for the high cost of living and the great extravagance of appropriations of the peoples' money. Potatoes were then 60 cents a bushel and now they are $4 a bushel.

The bonded indebtedness of this Government then was $900,000,000, and now it is $9,000,000,000. They criticized us for extravagant expenditure of the people's money, and we then spent $1,100,000,000 in one year. Now, they are spending three and one-half billion this year. Oh, what a lovely mess. [Laughter and applause.] But please forget it, gentlemen; I don't want to be sarcastic, because I am with you in war, although I am against you in politics.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I want to say with reference to the tariff that in one year Canada sent into the United States 4,000,000 feet of prepared lumber more than the whole United States sent into the rest of the world.

Mr. FORDNEY. Don't get me started on lumber, because I am a lumberjack. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, with the lumber export of both those countries gone, is it hardly fair for Canada to have the United States market free of charge?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; it is not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 11) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

EMERGENCY BOND ISSUE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised to see Members hesitate now. It is too late to be counting the cost. The time to have done that was before we entered into the horrible conflict. I was opposed to it and did everything in my power against it. I faced traduction of newspapers and submitted to the sneers and jeers of those who were clamoring for war. If I could have averted the awful catastrophe by the sacrifice of my life I believe I would have paid the price.

Under our Constitution nobody but Congress had power to choose between peace and war. An overwhelming majority chose war. We are all bound by the action of that majority. The war resolution directs the President to wage war on Germany and to use all the men and all the resources of the country necessary to bring it to a speedy and successful conclusion. In the performance of that task every loyal American must stand by the President.

He must have men. It is said that he needs 500,000 now to be sent to Europe. He has told us that we must pass laws enabling him to conscript the soldiers required.

The greatest sacrifice any citizen can be required to make for his country is to lay down his life under her flag. That is the sacrifice demanded of our boys now.

But to successfully conduct war the President must have money and resources. These would be even more reluctantly volunteered than would soldiers. These things must also be conscripted. If we compel our boys to yield up their lives, we should likewise compel the wealthy to yield up of their wealth. The bill which we are considering, which is probably but a beginning, fastens a debt of $7,000,000,000 upon the country. To allow it to stand as a perpetual burden to oppress our children through the ages would be not only unwise but unpatriotic. Let the strong arm of the law which compels our young men to go out on the battle plains to struggle and die also lay hold of a share of the wealth of the land to sustain those who fight the battles of the Republic. With that end in view I offer the following amendment to the pending bill:

That to provide funds for the payment of the bonds and other indebtedness of the United States created under the provisions of this act, in addition to the taxes now provided by law there shall be levied and collected upon all net incomes of persons in excess of $4,000 a tax of 1 per cent on the first $1,000 of such excess and an increase in the rate of such tax on a sliding scale on each succeeding $1,000 of such excess to a point which will not allow any person to retain an annual net income in excess of $50,000; and upon the profits of all corporations and joint-stock companies in excess of 8 per cent of their capital stock a tax of 8 per cent of the first 1 per cent of such excess and an increase in the rate of such tax on a sliding scale of 2 per cent on each succeeding one-fourth of 1 per cent of such excess to a point which will not allow any corporation or joint-stock company to retain an annual profit exceeding 12 per cent of its capital stock. The levy and collection of the taxes herein provided for shall not be continued after the bonds and other indebtedness of the United States created under the provisions of this act have been paid or funds sufficient for that purpose have been secured.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, there are 14 Democrats, 9 Republicans, and 1 Progressive on the Ways and Means Committee. Thank the Lord, every man Jack of them voted to lend $3,000,000,000 to the allies. You can not beat that for a good beginning. Now, let us stop boggling and give the President the Army he wants. If the President sits tight he will get his Army draft bill through by a big majority.

For four years this has been a rubber-stamp Congress when there was no need of it. Now the time has come when there is imperative need of it, and yet we start to boggle over the Army bill. Well, I for one, here and now, announce that so far as these war measures are concerned I propose to be a rubber-stamp Congressman, and I believe that the large majority of the Republicans in this House have exactly the same intention. I appeal to my Republican colleagues in this House to join with me in voting for what the President wants without a day's delay. We have been talking a lot about rising above partisanship; now let us quit talking about it and proceed to do it. What the President says he needs, that I shall vote to give him, not because I want to shove off my responsibility on him, but because he knows what is going on and I do not.

Mr. Chairman, as sure as you are an inch high the people want us to send any troops we can spare over to France right off quick. Even if we can only send a small brigade of Regulars, the people want the Stars and Stripes waving over those trenches just as soon as the color bearer can get there. They want a first-class sample of our manhood to go over and clap the allies on the back and wish them well and tell them to hang on till we can get there to help them.

If you do not believe what I say, Mr. Chairman, try out the next audience you speak to. I wish you could have been over in Baltimore last Sunday to hear the people howl when one of the speakers advocated a trip to the trenches for Uncle Sam's boys. In New York an audience of 7,000 took the roof of the Hippodrome off when they heard the same thing suggested.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I wanted to remind the gentleman that he just tried it out on this audience and there was not much applause. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER. Oh, I have tried a great many things out on this audience and I never had any applause. [Laughter.]

If you want enthusiasm in this country, Mr. Chairman, pitch in; do not hang around the edge. Do not try to fight a duel with swords at 30 paces. If it takes us a year to get a trained army of half a million Ironsides, all right; we must wait; that is all. Meanwhile, if Roosevelt or any other Pied Piper can whistle 25,000 fanatics after him, for Heaven's sake give him the chance. He may whistle his division into the trenches half trained, of course; but I will wager that they will make up in nerve what they lack in drill. Roosevelt is no fool. He will not make a botch of it. He will do the same sort of a job with his division that he did with his Rough Riders if you only give him the chance. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will once more admonish the galleries that under the rules of the House expressions of approval or disapproval are not permitted, and if indulged in again the Chair will have the galleries cleared.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, just one moment. I would like to state I would be very much pleased if we could finish general debate by 6 or half past 6 to-day and then meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning and go on with the bill under the five-minute rule; and I hope gentlemen, if they can, will cut their remarks as short as possible, so that we can finish general debate by 6 or half past 6.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if that is the purpose why would it not be better to have the time controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina and the ranking member of the minority [Mr. FORDNEY] so that the time might be parcelled out so that it would not go beyond that time?

Mr. KITCHIN. We could have made that arrangement before we went into the committee, but we had no idea that so many people desired to discuss the bill, and we thought general debate would have been finished by 4 o'clock.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How many speakers has the gentleman on his side?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know, because they have been asking their time from the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has six requests with no statement as to the amount of time in some instances.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed so that we may rise this evening at half past 6 o'clock.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman realize it would not be fair unless some arrangement was made as to parceling out the time?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would ask that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] control half the time and I control half, if that would be satisfactory.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is there any possibility of finishing this debate to-day?

Mr. KITCHIN. I should think so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I mean to finish the debate so as to have a vote upon the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; not to vote upon the bill but close general debate and rise and adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow, and then take up the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can not we come to some arrangement as to when we shall adjourn to-morrow? I know of a number of gentlemen who have engagements for to-morrow evening.

Mr. KITCHIN. I could not tell, but if we get through general debate at half past 6, then I should ask that we adjourn to meet at 11, and I should say we would get through in two hours under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman if he feels that we can complete the bill in two hours' time to-morrow?

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course, I do not know; but I should not think it would take any more than that. We have discussed here practically all the serious amendments to be offered.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it the idea we might come to a vote by 1 o'clock?

Mr. KITCHIN. I should say between 1 and 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I doubt very much whether debate will be exhausted in two hours under the five-minute rule, and there is no use in misleading anyone.

Mr. KITCHIN. I should think we could get through in an hour or two if we meet at 11 o'clock.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know; but you can not do it in two hours.

Mr. KITCHIN. We can close debate, I should think, in three hours.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Why could not the gentleman run a little bit to-night, so as to make it a short day to-morrow?

Mr. KITCHIN. I was hoping we could make an agreement to close general debate to-night about half past 6, but I could not guarantee how long it would take to-morrow.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to that.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman, unless there are more amendments offered than those which have been suggested to-day, I should think we could close debate under the five-minute rule before 2 o'clock.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman can not do that; as long as amendments are offered they will be debatable.

Mr. KITCHIN. Under the five-minute rule? Yes; you can.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman can not fix any time in the Committee of the Whole House when he is going to finish debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. KITCHIN. I said I will move to close debate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. On the different amendments?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That might not enable the gentleman to finish by 2 o'clock.

Mr. KITCHIN. I say, if there are no more serious amendments offered than those that have been suggested here to-day.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not come to some agreement, so far as the termination of general debate is concerned, and leave the other matter open for future consideration?

Mr. KITCHIN. I could not make an arrangement about to-morrow, but it is my opinion that if we can meet at 11 o'clock we can finish by about 2 o'clock. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all general debate close at half past 6 this afternoon, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] to control half of the time and I to control the other half.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, let me suggest this, if I may do so, to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] is not here. I see on his list requests of gentlemen for time which will take two hours. That would bring us until a quarter past 5 on this side. How much time does the gentleman himself want?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think there are requests for about an hour and a half on this side.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I make this suggestion——

Mr. KITCHIN. That would make it up until half past 6.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Let me make this suggestion, Mr. Chairman, namely, that we agree to close at half past 6, and then, if we find that there may be some other gentlemen, to begin at 11 o'clock to-morrow and let general debate run until 12.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then we will not get through to-morrow. Let us finish general debate at half past 6 to-night. Give me an hour and a half. I do not think we will use over an hour.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to say that four hours have now been consumed, all of them in favor of the bill as it now stands, and I would like to know whether there will be any opportunity for anyone at an early time to get time who is opposed to the bill as it now stands?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say to the gentleman that on this list he is accorded 30 minutes, and the Chairman informed me a moment ago that they would recognize anyone opposed to the bill in preference to one now who was in favor of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has submitted a unanimous-consent request. The Chair is not clear what his duty is under the circumstances.

Mr. KITCHIN. I recognize it is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not clear whether or not the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union ought to submit the request. The Chair suggests that the committee rise and get an agreement.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2762) to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and to extend credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EMERGENCY BOND ISSUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 2762, and, pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate close in three hours and a half, and that the time be divided as follows: Two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and an hour and 30 minutes by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 2762, and, pending that, he asks unanimous consent that the general debate be limited to three hours and a half, two hours to be controlled by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and an hour and a half by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, that includes the 30 minutes yielded to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]?

Mr. KITCHIN. He is down on the list of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That includes him?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2762) to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and to extend credit for foreign Governments, and for other purposes, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, the bill now before the House provides for the issuance of $5,000,000,000 of bonds to be sold at not less than par and bearing an interest rate not in excess of 3½ per cent. Three billion dollars of this issue is to be used in purchasing the bonds and obligations of foreign Governments, the purchase to be made under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury with the approval of the President of the United States. The remaining $2,000,000,000 is to be used to conduct our own operations in the conduct of the war.

The purchase of $3,000,000,000 of the obligations of foreign countries is for the purpose of establishing credit in the United States for foreign Governments in order that these Governments may have the means to prosecute the war against Germany in a more efficient and effective manner.

Congress has pledged the resources of the country to the President of the United States in order that vigorous measures may be taken and the war with Germany carried on to a successful and speedy conclusion. This is no time for us to hold back because of expense. Failure to assist with money and supplies those countries which are now waging war against an enemy of the United States would be a serious mistake on our part.

Strengthening the credit of those foreign countries to whom this money will be loaned is a severe blow to the common enemy. Wisdom dictates and common sense approves that at this stage of the war no more effective blow can be delivered by the United States against Germany than the passage of this bill. The foreign countries who will benefit by the passage of this measure have strained their credit by continual borrowing until they are now forced to pay such exorbitant interest rates that their usefulness in the field has been restricted. The need for money and supplies is great. Purchasing their obligations will enable them to obtain the supplies and munitions needed. I sincerely trust that there will not be a single vote against the passage of this bill.

Never before in the history of the American people has the Ways and Means Committee ever reported to Congress so stupendous a bill. There will be other bills to follow this, as it is already estimated that in addition to the $5,000,000,000 bond issue now before the House and the $472,000,000 bond issue authorized at various times during the closing days of the last Congress, $1,500,000,000 will be needed to carry on the war. No one can foresee how much more may be needed, but we all admit and know that this is no time to curtail expense when money is needed to prosecute the war.

Before going into the details of this bill it might be interesting at this time to review the bonded indebtedness of the United States as compared with several of the larger and more powerful countries of Europe.

On February 28, 1917, the entire bonded indebtedness of the United States was $973,000,000. To this must be added $150,000,000 for the use of the Navy authorized to be issued a short time ago, $100,000,000 authorized in the last revenue bill, and $222,000,000 Panama Canal bonds, making a total of $1,445,000,000. The $5,000,000,000 authorized in the present bill makes the total bonded indebtedness of the United States $6,445,000,000.

The $3,000,000,000 we intend to loan to foreign Governments should be deducted, as the money provided for this purpose will be returned by the foreign Governments, which leaves, after the passage of this bill, a total bonded indebtedness of $3,445,000,000.

The debt of the United Kingdom on March 31, 1914, was $3,400,000,000, about what our bonded indebtedness will be when this bill becomes a law. By the middle of November, 1916, the debt of the United Kingdom had increased to $15,800,000,000. The debt of France on January 1, 1914, was about $6,000,000,000, which has been increased up to August 31, 1916, to about $14,000,000,000.

The enactment of this bill into law will give us a bonded indebtedness of $3,445,000,000, not counting the $3,000,000,000 we loan the foreign Governments. But it must be remembered that the amount provided for in this bill will not be sufficient for our needs, as the estimates now are $3,500,000,000; $2,000,000,000 of this amount is provided for in the bill before the House and $1,500,000,000 must be provided for by taxation or otherwise.

At the close of the Civil War the United States had a bonded indebtedness on August 31, 1865, of $2,381,000,000, which was the largest bonded debt the United States has ever owed in its entire history. In that year there was a population in the United States of 34,748,000. Now our bonded indebtedness will be by the passage of this bill $3,445,000,000, deducting the $3,000,000,000 to be loaned to the foreign Governments, and we have an estimated population of 103,000,000 people.

The wealth of the United States in 1870 was estimated at $30,068,518,000, which was a per capita wealth of $779.83. The wealth of the United States in 1912 was estimated at $187,739,071,090, with a per capita wealth of $1,965.

During the eight years prior to 1912 the wealth of the United States was increased about 75 per cent, or about 9 per cent per year. During the last four years the increase has been upon a much larger percentage than that, but estimating the increase of the Nation's wealth at 10 per cent per annum and we find in 1917 that the wealth of the United States is something like $263,000,000,000, which is a per capita wealth of about $2,600.

These figures are reassuring and conclusively demonstrate that there is no reason for anyone to become apprehensive because of the increase in our national debt.

The total ordinary receipts—that is, the receipts from customs, ordinary internal revenue, emergency revenue, corporation and income tax, sales of public lands, and miscellaneous items—during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, amounted to $779,664,532.49. It is estimated that the like receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, will be $975,750,000. We estimate that under existing law the like receipts, including the receipts from the excess profits tax and the receipts from the estate tax at the increased rate during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, will amount to $1,237,750,000. This amount, however, will all be needed to run the ordinary expenses of the Federal Government and does not in any manner include the additional amount needed for war purposes, which is $1,500,000,000.

But to return to the bill before the House.

The $5,000,000,000 of bonds provided in the bill bears an interest rate not exceeding 3½ per cent, and these bonds are exempt from all kinds of State, county, municipal, and Federal taxation, but the transference of these bonds shall be subject to both State and national taxes on estates or inheritances. I understand, however, that a motion will be made to strike this feature from the bill and exempt these bonds from the inheritance tax, but the committee after much deliberation decided to leave this exception in the bill. I hope that this will be done.

Three and one-half per cent is a higher rate of interest than United States bonds have borne in many years, but we must remember that these bonds are issued for a stupendous amount. It is a war debt. Other countries are paying 6 per cent, and in some instances, I understand, even more. Certainly with the enormous collateral foreign countries are forced to put up in order to sell their bonds, it makes the rate much higher than 6 per cent.

These bonds will be offered in small denominations to the public and will prove an attractive field of investment for small investors. They will be offered at not less than par, and it is hoped and believed that they will command a premium, as all citizens of the United States will be given an equal opportunity to participate in the purchase and sale, and as the bonds are subject to be converted into higher interest-bearing bonds if at a later date the Congress should authorize the issuance of bonds at more than 3½ per cent.

The bill specifically provides that no commission shall be allowed or paid on any bonds issued in this bill.

As far as the lending of the $3,000,000,000 to the foreign Governments which are now waging war against Germany is concerned, this bill is carefully drawn, and the Government of the United States is protected by every means care and caution could devise.

If at a future day we find that it may become necessary to issue more bonds at a higher rate of interest than those bear which are provided in this bill, then the bonds authorized in this bill will be converted into bonds bearing the higher rate.

The only bonds this bill will permit the United States to purchase from foreign Governments are their own Government bonds sold to us by the foreign Government itself. It does not permit the United States to purchase any foreign Government bonds from an individual who may own them. The purchase must be made from the foreign Government itself.

Now, then, in case the bonds provided for in this bill should be converted into higher interest-bearing bonds, then the foreign governmental bonds which we hold by purchase shall automatically be converted into bonds bearing the same rate of interest as the converted United States bonds.

The Secretary of the Treasury, under the terms and conditions he may subscribe, is authorized to receive payment on these foreign bonds on or before maturity, and he is also authorized to sell at any time, at not less than the purchase price, any or all of these foreign obligations and with the proceeds redeem and purchase any outstanding interest-bearing obligations of the United States which may at such time be subject to call or which may be purchased at not more than par or accrued interest.

The $150,000,000 bond issue authorized in the last Congress for the immediate need of naval construction, the $100,000,000 issue provided for in the revenue act of last March, and the $222,000,000 of Panama Canal bonds to meet public expenditures on account of the Mexican situation, the construction of the armor-plate plant, the construction of the Alaskan Railway, the purchase of the Danish West Indies, and other expenditures amounting to $472,000,000 are reauthorized by this bill, and are converted into bonds similar to the issue of the $5,000,000,000 bonds in this bill.

In addition to this, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to borrow from time to time on the credit of the United States to carry out the purpose of this bill and to meet public expenditures such sums as he may deem necessary and to issue therefor certificates of indebtedness at not less than par and in no larger amount than $2,000,000,000 and not exceeding an interest rate of 3½ per cent, which certificates shall be paid and redeemed at a time not exceeding one year from the date of their issuance.

The fear has been expressed by some here to-day that placing $5,000,000,000 of 3½ per cent bonds upon the market will depreciate the $682,000,000 outstanding 2 per cent bonds. These 2 per cent bonds have the privilege of circulation, a privilege which is denied the issue authorized in the bill before the House. For this reason I do not believe that the sale of the $5,000,000,000 issue will materially affect the outstanding 2 per cent bonds.

This is a large revenue measure, larger than any ever before presented to Congress. It will be followed by a tax measure which of itself will perhaps be the largest tax bill ever presented to Congress.

I do not believe that there will be need for us to appeal to the patriotism of our people to get their assent to these measures. We, acting for them, pledged the resources of our country to the President of the United States to carry on this war. That pledge we gave in their behalf will be in part redeemed by them by their cheerful acquiescence in the tax bills we may present. I hope this bill will receive the support of every Member of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask if there is any recognition to be given to the opposition to this bill? If not, being the ranking member here on the committee, I shall proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that, prior to the making of the agreement entered into in the House a few moments ago, the Chair had indicated that a number of gentlemen having spoken, all in favor of the bill, he would recognize those opposing the bill; and if the House had proceeded under that authority the Chair would have recognized some one who stated he was opposed to the bill. But the Chair feels that that matter has now passed out of the Chair's control and is in the control absolutely of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As the gentleman from Michigan has arrived, I shall ask him to yield to whomsoever he wishes to.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin says that in my absence there was an agreement made with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that he should have 30 minutes. I left the list to be given to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. I do not care which gentleman is recognized first, but I had the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] down to be recognized next. The gentleman from Wisconsin says that the agreement was with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LENROOT. All the speeches that have been made so far have been in favor of the bill as it now stands. I am opposed to the bill as it now stands, but would vote for it with an amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman from Wisconsin follows, it violates the courtesy that is due to the members of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that that is hardly a matter for argument on the floor.

Mr. FORDNEY. Without any discourtesy, I had agreed to recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. LENROOT. But the gentleman had no power of recognition at that time; it lay with the Chair. The gentleman could not make an agreement.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman could not make an agreement with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LONGWORTH. There was no agreement. I simply said that the gentleman from Wisconsin was included in that agreement and was to have 30 minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will have to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I do it with all courtesy and friendly feeling to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, hoping for an honorable peace, but solemnly weighing the responsibilities imposed upon me as a Representative, I voted, on the morning of April 6, for the resolution urged by the President of the United States declaring the existence of a state of war with the Imperial Government of Germany. That determination arrived at, I now feel it my duty to loyally support all reasonable measures asked for by the President to prosecute to a successful and speedy termination the war thus proclaimed.

The President is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and upon him devolves the duty of mobilizing and directing our forces upon land and sea. It remains our privilege, however, under the Constitution, which we are both sworn to support and defend, to cooperate with him and to provide him with those ways and means which he may deem necessary to adequately and effectively enforce and sustain the national security and defense and to quickly restore, as we trust and believe he will, that "domestic tranquillity" and those "blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity" which were guaranteed by our forefathers in the Constitution—our bulwark and our guide from the days of Washington to this hour.

The bill reported by the Ways and Means Committee and now under discussion is the first of the measures advanced by the President to obtain the necessary resources for financing the war. Its tremendous import is instantly apparent, since no American Congress has ever before been called upon to consider anything approaching it in domestic and world-wide significance, and possibly no legislative body in all the world's history has been called upon to deal with a legislative parallel. In short, the measure now before us may be regarded as absolutely without precedent. It is the first of its kind.

The bill is in the nature of an authorization to the President to perfect his plans. It provides for the raising of $5,000,000,000 by bond issues and $2,000,000,000 by an issue of certificates of indebtedness, a total of $7,000,000,000—certainly the largest amount ever provided by an American Congress, and, in a monetary sense, the largest sum ever struck off in a single measure in any country. Charged directly against the people of the United States, it would represent a tax of $70 upon every man, woman, and child, or of $210 upon every family of three. Hasty calculations show that reduced to dollar bills, placed end to end, the amount herein provided would several times encircle the globe.

Of this colossal obligation which the Government of the United States is about to assume—more, I believe, for the benefit of other nations than for our own—$2,000,000,000 is to be raised by certificates of indebtedness, the proceeds of which are to be applied to preparedness purposes and for the prosecution of the war, as set forth in certain estimates already submitted to Congress, or to be submitted, by the Secretary of the Treasury; $2,000,000,000 of the permanent bond issue is also to be applied to these expenditures as authorized by Congress, and the remaining $3,000,000,000 of the proceeds of the permanent bond issue is to be set aside as provided in section 2 of the bill, "for the purpose of establishing credits in the United States for foreign Governments." This vast sum, far exceeding the cost of the Civil War, is to be passed over for the purpose indicated for disposal by "the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President," "to purchase from such foreign Governments, at par, their obligations, bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States, issued under authority of this act." The Secretary of the Treasury, "with the approval of the President," is authorized "to enter into such arrangements as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for purchasing such obligations of foreign Governments and for the subsequent repayment thereof," and so forth, as may be approved by the President. It is clear that as to this $3,000,000,000, which is to be used "for the purpose of establishing credits in the United States for foreign Governments," Congress, with the passage of this act, relinquishes all authority to the President. Except as provided in the bill, there is no official information as to which foreign nations the President proposes to favor, nor is it certain that he may limit the assistance intended "for foreign Governments" to those nations which are now actually at war with Germany.

If the bill passes with section 2 unamended the President will probably have power to purchase the securities of nations not at war if, in his judgment, such assistance may contribute to the early termination of hostilities and to a victory satisfactory to the United States. It was my intention to introduce an amendment to section 2 limiting the powers of the President in the "arrangements" to be made with foreign Governments, to straight-cut financial loan transactions, free from possible entangling alliances of a political or economic character; but I have been advised that such an amendment would not be agreeable to the administration and am persuaded it could not pass. I do not hesitate, however, to express the hope that such "arrangements" as the President may make with foreign Governments at war with Germany may be so made that all American rights may be securely safeguarded so that when the war ceases the United States of America, with due consideration and regard for all other nations, whether in the past they have been our friends or our foes, may stand forth free and independent, generous to all, but cringing to none.

The various addresses of the President to Congress setting forth his high purposes in this regard, contending for world peace and a purer democracy as a result of this war, are such assurances as can not in this crisis be misunderstood. Giving the President authority, as we do by this bill, and placing him in funds to sustain the honor of our Nation as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, we must trust the President. It is the one way now, no matter what the sacrifice, to quickly end the war.

There are some details of the bill which may be briefly discussed. The bonding feature presents some of these, especially as they relate to the possible influence of large banking interests, which will naturally figure in such an unusual financial transaction. It has been stated that through American bankers certain foreign Governments, sadly in need of funds, might be tempted to unload ancient foreign securities upon the United States, and that ultimately the United States would be asked to extinguish its loans or to suffer repudiation. Apparently the administration is not impressed with the thought that any one of the foreign Governments whose bonds may be purchased by the United States will not be amply able to repay. It is pointed out also that as the interest charges for both the United States bonds and the corresponding foreign bonds are to be identical, i. e., 3½ per cent, that Congress and the country would soon be advised of such delinquencies.

This question was discussed in committee, but having sought independent information with respect to it I may be privileged to say that the matter of repayment of these foreign loans, frankly speaking, is not clearly defined. It is up to the President; but it seems to me that if we are to send both men and money to the belligerents, apart from our direct participation in the war, there should be fixed a limit of time for these foreign loans to run. A 30-year period would not, in my judgment, be unreasonable.

Mr. Chairman, another detail of the bill relates to interest charges. It provides for the conversion of existing bond authorizations at 3 per cent to the 3½ per cent rate, or to a higher rate if Congress shall later on determine to increase the rate. As to foreign bonds purchased, however, the same conversion condition would apply, and if foreign interest is paid as promptly as American interest is paid and all bonds are ultimately redeemed, conditions would equalize themselves as to any part or all of the $3,000,000,000 issue to establish foreign credits.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman has evidently read the bill with a good deal of care. Does he find anywhere in it a limitation on the power given to the Executive, or is it not a general power for national purposes and defense to last until the payment of these bonds?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As I read it, there is absolutely no limitation on the President as to whom he shall make these loan exchanges except to "foreign Governments."

Mr. HILL. Nor is there any limit of time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is no time limit fixed in the bill.

Mr. HILL. It may run until the time of final payment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The bonds are to run indefinitely. I think they ought to be redeemable in 30 years. They could be extended if necessary.

The bill does not specifically provide for taxation, although it is clearly the intent of the President, as expressed in his war address of April 2 and since, to relieve at least a part of the bond issue by direct taxes. Most, if not all, of the $2,000,000,000 issue of credits of indebtedness may be repaid by taxes. We are not yet informed as to the manner in which these taxes are to be distributed, although recommendations from the administration are said to be forthcoming.

It is a certainty, however, that direct taxes will be levied, and unless the war is speedily ended will necessarily be increased. This is another reason for treating our foreign loans as financial transactions which we expect to have paid in good faith, for ultimately the people of the United States must pay if the foreign Governments do not.

Assurance is given in the bill that "no commissions shall be allowed or paid on any bonds issued under authority of this act." But it is not to be understood that this monumental financial authorization is to be effected without cost. The final section of the bill—section 7—provides for an equivalent of $12,000,000, which the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use "to pay all necessary expenses, including rent, connected with any operations under this act." As to the expenditure of this money, Congress will have no responsibility after the passage of this bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes. I have two minutes more.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman is a member of the committee that prepared this bill. I was not in the House this morning when the majority leader discussed it at length. I want to ask the gentleman if this section of the bill was discussed in the committee, and if there was a discussion as to how this $12,000,000 would be expended?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There was some discussion, and the Secretary of the Treasury related some of the reasons why so large a sum should be appropriated for this purpose. I understand that all the certificates are to be printed in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, but there has been an increase in all costs upon which the Secretary laid some stress. He also indicated that much advertising would have to be done, and that there would have to be a strong drive in order to dispose of these bonds promptly and to effectuate the purpose the President has in mind. The Secretary indicated that he might give information more in detail if desired.

Taken all in all, Mr. Chairman, this bill, so brief and direct in its phraseology, is the most portentious—may I say the most awesome—that American legislators have ever been called upon to consider. It involves each and all of those important factors which the President described in his address of April 2—the financial credits, the organization and mobilization of our material resources, the equipment of our Army and Navy, and the immediate action of our armed forces—and it will also involve, as it has already involved, the business, the happiness, and the homes of a peace-loving and God-fearing people, who have believed themselves secure from the ravages of a European war. But involving all these as it does, Mr. Chairman, there is now but one side to this controversy, and that is our side. There is but one course to pursue and that to stand steadfastly by the flag we have learned to revere.

I shall vote for this bill, trusting in the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy to vigorously prosecute this war and to bring us speedily to an honorable and a permanent peace. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] 10 minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen are right in saying that this measure presents a new theory in American politics. It has not been unusual in the past for nations to subsidize the military operations of other nations. In fact, it has been the most usual course of war since the time when money as a circulating medium was in existence; but it is a new proposition to the American Nation. We have never had occasion before to confront so novel, so difficult, and so important a question as we have presented in this bill.

It is new in this respect also that this act is to be done by the representatives of the people themselves, by general legislation. Usually all forms of subsidies given by one nation to another have been through the devious and underhand course of diplomacy. We to-day in the open daylight, and upon the plain-deal table of the business counter, are committing ourselves to a policy of extending our aid and advancing our credit to those who are fighting the same battle that we are fighting.

I am for this proposition for many reasons, and not the least of them is that it is a perfectly open transaction. Having entered upon this war it is our duty to perform from the very beginning the most effective part in it that we can perform. At this time the most effective part that we can perform is to strengthen and extend the credit of the nations already in the field with their armies, and permit them to purchase the necessary supplies to make those armies efficient and successful. But it has another interesting phase in it beside its great political change, and that is its financial and commercial change. It brings to our Nation definitely and finally, as I believe, the control of the finances of the world, and makes of us the financial center of the earth. It makes the dollar the medium of exchange, and provides for the repayment of these obligations in the coin and currency of the United States. The transaction so far is a benefit to us. It is a benefit to us that we have the power to finance these great movements of other nations, and it is a benefit to us that they must come and ask such aid of the great American Republic. It is a benefit to us that the financial capital of the world has been transferred to American soil. It is a benefit to us that our financial resources are sought for by the nations of the world, and it is further a benefit to us that by the very restrictions of this bill this money is to be expended among the business men, producers, and toilers in America.

Mr. HILL. There is no such limitation in the bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Well, I take it that that is the practical and necessary operation of the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. No.

Mr. BORLAND. It is expressed in section 2 of the bill that the purpose is to reestablish the credit of those countries "in the United States." It is so expressly stated, and their credit has been mostly used in this country. I will say to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] that if the administration was not fully assured that this issue of bonds would unquestionably be absorbed in this country, no such proposition would have been put forth.

Mr. HILL. That is true. We shall take the bonds——

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman does not doubt that.

Mr. HILL. But the money goes to the credit in the banks of the countries to which it is loaned, and they will spend it where they please and as they choose, and it can not be done in any other way. Do not get the idea that we are going to work it out.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is a very shrewd business man and fully conversant with business conditions. He knows that if a bond issue of that magnitude is absorbed in this country it will be largely absorbed through the same sentiment that makes the sale of the goods, and that it is practically not within the realm of probable conjecture that any of it will be spent in other countries.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman think that sordid sentiment will actuate those who invest in these bonds?

Mr. BORLAND. I think not. These bonds are not all for the purposes of the allies.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The proceeds of $2,000,000,000 of these bonds are to be expended to fit us for war, and $3,000,000,000 of them we simply exchange bonds with the allies, and the proceeds of those bonds will go to the allies to spend where they please.

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And I do not want any sordid sentiment to be injected into our part of this enterprise.

Mr. BORLAND. Sordid, as the gentleman may call it, I still think every dollar of that $3,000,000,000 that goes to the allies will go to sustain their credit in the United States and not elsewhere. In fact, the bill so states. The point I am making is that up to that point it is a sordid benefit. It is a sordid benefit for us, and we have derived and will derive a benefit from the issue of these bonds.

I hope that our part in this war shall be greater and different in kind from the mere question of advancing credit. I hope that gentlemen are wrong when they say we shall keep our men safely at home and simply sell goods or loan money to those engaged in war. I would not consider that we had a just cause for war if it extended no further than to loan money to the nations who are fighting and whose troops are in the field. I hope that when the time comes we will be willing to perform, and not only willing but be ready and prepared to perform, our full part in this world war. It might easily be that if we had challenged the right of any nation to assail our commerce on the sea we would have conducted that war single handed. We would have had by our own force, by our own men, by our own ships to maintain the dignity and the sanctity of the American flag. I think we owe the same duty, having declared war in concert with other powers, to use our full resources as we have pledged in the resolution of war we should do. We pledged the full resources of the United States, not in a trafficking agreement by which we sold goods in exchange for foreign bonds, however valuable and desirable that may be and however necessary it may be at this stage, but we have pledged the full resources of this country to carry this war to a successful and early conclusion. I hope this will only be a step, an important step it is true, and at this time a necessary and indispensable step, in carrying on this war, but that it will not mark the measure of America's participation in the war. I hope we will not ease our conscience with the idea that because we have furnished these men things absolutely needed for them by which they may continue the struggle that we will have done our part in the war. We should look upon this question as though we were the sole combatant, as though we were maintaining the rights and dignities of America single handed and without the aid of any other nation. We should prepare from now on to fight that battle as though all of the other nations were to conclude peace before daylight to-morrow morning and leave us alone single handed to reckon with those whom we claim have assailed American rights.

It is very easy for gentlemen to comment on the enormous amount of this bond issue. The burden of taxation and the burden of bonded indebtedness is relative. I shall undertake to say that never before in the history of the world, and never in the history of any other nation in the world, could such an issue of bonds be made and absorbed at such a rate of interest and with similar ease as that with which this will be absorbed. What does that mean? It means that it does not exhaust, it does not impose a serious burden upon, the great and growing wealth of the American people, and that this act, large as it seems in our eyes, is but the beginning of the struggle upon which America is entered.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I intend to vote for this bond issue, and I do it with the full realization of what it means in the way of an extended bonded debt. It is bewildering, but we have no other choice. We did not voluntarily go into the war; the war came upon us, and we so declared; and now I intend to vote for what seems to be necessary to do our part in it. I do it in the hope that the indebtedness will not increase as it has in Europe. It is absolutely bewildering to state the fact that the interest charge upon the debt of the European belligerent countries is greater than the entire budget of all of the countries prior to the war. We hope that will not be the case in our own country; but though it be, we can not withhold the support of the Government in the time of its supremest trial, and I shall vote for the measure as my duty to my country.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, unless this bill shall be amended in at least one important particular I shall feel compelled to vote against it; but I hope and expect from the speech of the chairman of the committee this morning that in at least that respect, which I shall hereafter mention, the bill will be amended, and I then hope that it may have the unanimous vote of this House. At the very outset I want to make plain what my position is upon the bill. My objections to it in its present form relate wholly to section 2, the section providing for the purchase of bonds of foreign Governments. I am willing to vote for a bond issue of $5,000,000,000, to authorize the issuance of certificates of indebtedness for $2,000,000,000, as is provided in the bill. I am willing to vote for the purpose of aiding us in carrying on this war a loan to the allies of $3,000,000,000; but when we go that far that is as far as we should be asked to go. Section 2 is not limited in that respect at all. In the first place, from beginning to end, while this bill is treated as a war measure, there is nothing whatever in the bill to so indicate. This $3,000,000,000 loan, so far as the bill is concerned, is not confined to the purpose of carrying on this war. The authority of the Secretary of the Treasury is not so limited. He may loan the $3,000,000,000 with the approval of the President to any country upon the face of the earth for any purpose that he may see fit that seeks to establish a credit in this country. Moreover, his authority does not cease with the termination of the war between the United States and Germany. This is permanent legislation upon its face, and his authority will continue long after this war shall cease. It may not be the present President of the United States; it may not be the present Secretary of the Treasury using this power. Any future Secretary may use what may be left of the $3,000,000,000 for any purpose that he sees fit in the purchase of bonds of foreign countries. Mr. Chairman, there is very great necessity in this crisis of harmonious action between the legislative and the executive branches of the Government. We ought to be united upon all of these propositions as far as possible, but the responsibility for united action does not rest in Congress alone.

The executive branch of this Government is responsible as well in that respect, and it should make no demand of the Congress of the United States that can not be justified in carrying on this war. So this language ought to be limited, and I know of no way by which Members of Congress can register their protests against this unheard-of exercise of power and delegation of authority except to protest upon this floor and at this time and by their votes which shall be cast. I realize full well, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] stated the other day, that in this war time the Congress in its legislation can not and should not go into full details. There must be very broad power and very wide discretion reposed in the President of the United States, but we have the right to insist that any legislation concerning this war that is asked of us shall upon its face confine the powers delegated to those necessary in the carrying on of this war.

Now, with reference to the loans that may be made. I fully agree with gentlemen who have said that it would be unwise to attempt to specify that these loans should be made to England or France or Russia or to any of the belligerent countries, or to attempt to specify the proportions of the fund which should be made to each of them. That from the nature of things must be and should be left to the discretion of the executive branch of this Government; but I do say we have the right to insist that when we are voting these staggering sums it is our duty to say to the executive branch of this Government that while we are willing to give you this power to make these loans to foreign governments, they shall be made only to such foreign governments as are engaged in war with our enemies, and that the purpose of these loans is not a matter of philanthropy to assist some foreign government but its only purpose is to enable the United States to win this war in which we are now engaged.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What phraseology would the gentleman use in which to include our ability to loan money to Italy?

Mr. LENROOT. I am very glad you speak of that. In the first place, while I understand Italy is at war with Germany, I can not positively so state. I have made many inquiries and I have not yet found any definite expression as to what the actual fact is. I am free to confess that I do not know, but, assuming that Italy is not at war with Germany to-day, she is at war with Austria. We are not, and, although diplomatic relations have been severed by the act of Austria, our status with Austria to-day is that of neutrality. Whatever may happen in the near future, and it is fair to assume and expect we will be in war with Austria before many weeks shall pass by—assuming that Italy is not in war with Germany and we are not at war with Austria shall we now loan a part of this $3,000,000,000 to Italy? I say no for two reasons: First, I assume we desire that our war be confined to Germany, and we should not give Austria an excuse and a reason for declaring war upon us, that while we were in the attitude of neutrality we had committed an unneutral act by loaning money to Italy which was one of the belligerents with her.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. PLATT. Suppose we loan money to Russia, Russia is at war with Austria?

Mr. LENROOT. I understand that, but we have the right to loan money to Russia, to France, and to England for our purposes to assist in our own war, and the fact that they may be at war with some country with which we are not in war can not in the least affect our status of neutrality. Throwing that aside, Italy, we will say, is not at war with Germany. We are. I would say to Italy, if you want a part of this $3,000,000,000, the only way you can be considered to get a part of that $3,000,000,000 is to help us fight Germany. Instead of that you are offering inducements to a country——

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman logically extends that doctrine to apply to loans to all countries who are not in war with Germany?

Mr. LENROOT. What does the gentleman mean?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman says we are offering inducements to Italy to become involved with Germany in order to secure a portion of this money. Why not extend it generally to all neutral countries not involved in war to induce them to become involved in war with Germany?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I would not loan money to any neutral country; but if that neutral country is willing to help us fight our enemies I would loan them money.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not Italy neutral so far as Germany is concerned—not engaged in war with Germany—and are not we offering inducements, in the gentleman's words, to have her become provoked into a war with Germany in order to secure a portion of this fund?

Mr. LENROOT. So far as that is concerned. I will very frankly answer the question of the gentleman. So long as we are in war with Germany we must aim to secure a successful termination of that war, and we should welcome aid and help from every quarter, no matter whence it comes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the logic of the gentleman's position is to involve all neutrals in war by offering this money as an inducement for them to become involved in war with Germany?

Mr. LENROOT. If $1,000,000,000 or $2,000,000,000, if other countries are in such condition that they are willing to join with the United States in this war with Germany if the United States will help finance them, to bring this war to an early conclusion, I would say, come on. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Can I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. Did I understand the gentleman to say that Italy was not in war with Germany?

Mr. LENROOT. My understanding is that she is, but it has been denied.

Mr. FLOOD. Italy declared war on Germany on the 28th of August, 1916.

Mr. LENROOT. That is exactly my understanding, and I have simply made this argument because of the fact that I was not in a position to give any official affirmation one way or the other.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman is right.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman now gives the exact date. So Italy is now entirely out of this question, and if these loans are confined, as they ought to be confined, to the aid of those countries that are now or hereafter may be engaged in war with Germany or any other country with which we are engaged in war, then Italy would have the benefit, if the administration sees fit to extend it, of a portion of these funds.

But I do say that Congress ought not to blindly, at least, vote an authority to the administrative side of this Government to loan any part of this $3,000,000,000 to any country that is not in war with our enemy.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Do I understand, then, that the gentleman's point is that this legislation ought to restrict the right to loan money or purchase bonds to such countries as are in war with Germany and to be coextensive with the period of that particular war?

Mr. LENROOT. Or with any other country that may be in war with us or we may be in war with.

Mr. BORLAND. Is not the gentleman taking an unusual ground with foreign nations, to dictate whether they shall be at war and whether they shall continue in war?

Mr. LENROOT. Not in the least.

Mr. BORLAND. Suppose, for instance, we should make a loan to Italy on the theory that she should be at war with Germany. A loan would come, payable when she would be in peace with Germany. What influence would that have on the conclusion of peace between Germany and Italy?

Mr. LENROOT. I would be very glad to have from the majority side of the House this afternoon some interpretation of what this bill really means. I take it from the gentleman's position it means the administration may loan a part of this $3,000,000,000 to some country that is not at all involved in this war. Is that the gentleman's position?

Mr. BORLAND. That is not the intention.

Mr. LENROOT. What is the meaning of the argument?

Mr. BORLAND. The intention is that when we buy the securities of this Nation we buy them on the credit of the Nation, whether in war or peace, and the Nation is under obligation to redeem those and use the money as it sees fit.

Mr. LENROOT. If Italy should to-morrow make peace with Germany, does the gentleman want the United States to use a portion of this $3,000,000,000 to buy the securities of Italy, if Italy is not assisting the United States at all in the prosecution of this war?

Mr. BORLAND. No such intention is expressed.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I do not catch the point the gentleman is making.

Mr. BORLAND. The money is loaned to these countries for the purpose of enabling them to continue this war, but not to place any restriction on their action as to how long they may continue it.

Mr. LENROOT. I have not made any such assertion or intimation, and if the gentleman had followed me he would have seen that I had not. My only point was that these loans, when made in the first instance, should be made only to countries that are now in war with our enemies.

Mr. BORLAND. To that extent the gentleman has the protection of the policy of the administration that proposed it. That is the very purpose of the loan.

Mr. LENROOT. Then why not express it in the bill? Will the gentleman answer?

Mr. BORLAND. I have already answered that, to the effect that that would be controlling the diplomatic relations of those countries to an extent that we have no right and no desire to do.

Mr. LENROOT. How do we control the diplomatic relations if we specify that these loans shall only go for war purposes to countries which are now engaged in war or countries hereafter engaged in war with our enemies?

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman said they should come to an end when peace was concluded.

Mr. LENROOT. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I will.

Mr. MANN. Under the terms of the bill as it stands, would not the Secretary of the Treasury have power to at once take the bonds from and loan money to the Republic of Colombia?

Mr. LENROOT. Absolutely.

Mr. MANN. Or any of the governments in Mexico?

Mr. LENROOT. Absolutely. Not only that, but when peace is declared between this country and Germany, if there is any portion of this $3,000,000,000 left, he will have the power after that to loan this money to Colombia, to loan it to Mexico, or to buy the bonds of any country upon the face of the earth.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] said that in this war time he was willing to become a rubber stamp. He may be. That is for him to decide. But Members of Congress have a responsibility; they have a duty to perform, and this legislation in section 2 is peculiarly a legislative proposition. I am not willing to become a rubber stamp.

Mr. GARDNER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Does the gentleman really think that all those possibilities that he conjured up about the President loaning money to Colombia and to other nations not at war are reasonable? Does he expect the President may possibly do that?

Mr. LENROOT. I will answer the question. If this administration did not have some thought of loaning a portion of this $3,000,000,000 to countries other than those which are now engaged in war with our enemies, why was this broad power included in the bill?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman consider the possibility that other powers may be involved?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly; and the amendment I shall propose provides for that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. So it is the same as the bill as it now stands?

Mr. LENROOT. No; it is not. There is no limitation or restriction whatever. Every speech on this floor to-day has assumed that this $3,000,000,000 is to be loaned to these allies engaged in war as we are engaged in war. The gentleman knows there is not a line in the bill containing any such restriction. The gentleman knows there is not a line in the bill that authorizes or limits this $3,000,000,000 even for the purpose of carrying on this war.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Let me understand the gentleman, if the gentleman will permit. Does he mean to say that we ought to offer in this bill an inducement to other powers which go to war, and say to them that we will loan them money if they go to war?

Mr. LENROOT. No. I would say we will not loan money to any country that is not helping us, because the only purpose of this immense sum of money is to help the United States win this war.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Very clearly; but the bill, while it is not exclusive, as the gentleman desires, is inclusive.

Mr. LENROOT. It authorizes the administration to loan money to every country on the face of the earth, for any purpose that it sees fit, so long as it establishes a credit in the United States.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Would he not go further and try to prevent the borrowing nations from expending that money injuriously? In that way the gentleman could add a great many amendments.

Mr. LENROOT. No. This is a practical amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. I understood I was to have 10 minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman be kind enough to read his amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; I will in just a moment. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] suggests that we might go much further and determine the manner of the spending of this money. But that is not a practical thing. I very freely concede it. But I want to say that nowhere, from any corner of the United States, until this bill came into Congress was there a suggestion from anybody from anywhere that a single dollar of this money should be loaned to anyone except to those who were fighting our enemy, namely, Germany.

Now, I have proposed an amendment; and I am glad to say that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] in his speech this morning stated that undoubtedly an amendment would be proposed to section 2 by the committee that would make it clear that the authority to loan this $3,000,000,000 should be for the purpose of carrying on this war and for the national defense. If that is done, I want very frankly to say that that will constitute a restriction and very much curtail the authority given. I think if that amendment is adopted I shall be able to vote for the bill, and I should like to see, in addition, two other amendments adopted that I would like to read. The first amendment, if adopted, to section 2, would make it read this way, if you have the bill before you:

That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national defense and carrying on the war by establishing credits in the United States for foreign Governments engaged in war with the Imperial Government of Germany or with any other Government with which the United States Government shall be at war, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized—

And so forth, to do these various things. That limits it. These loans, then, must be made not alone to the countries now at war with Germany, which is at war with us, but to any country that afterwards may come in and be making war upon our enemies. And the next amendment is a proviso that it seems to me ought to have the unanimous vote of this House when the time comes. It is in the form of a proviso to section 2. It reads:

Provided, That the authority granted by this section to the said Secretary of the Treasury to purchase bonds of foreign Governments, as aforesaid, shall cease upon the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial Government of Germany.

Can there be any objection to that? Is there any Member of this House that wants to continue the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury after our war is over to loan any portion of this $3,000,000,000 that may remain unexpended to any nation that he may see fit? There surely can not be. What objection can there be to putting that restriction in the bill? If that restriction is opposed, there can be only one conclusion, and that is that, notwithstanding the views expressed by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] that the administration would have no thought of loaning money to the United States of Colombia or to Mexico, that, nevertheless, if this restriction or a similar one is refused in this bill, we have the right to believe that there is some such thought upon the part of the administration.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SWITZER. Suppose that the Secretary were negotiating for bonds, taking up foreign bonds, and a foreign government had contracted a debt. Would this hinder or in some way handicap him in carrying out the intention of this Government?

Mr. LENROOT. No. My only limitation is upon the purchase of bonds; all the other provisions of section 2 will remain in full force for the future.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Does the gentleman contend, simply because some Member of this House objects to putting in a restriction, that that must necessarily mean that the President proposes secretly to do that which you propose to restrict? Because if so, I would like to ask the gentleman if he ever heard of a man's objecting to being restricted on account of the fact that we can not foresee future contingencies?

Mr. LENROOT. I am very glad to answer that question. In the first place, if they had no such thought as the gentleman has in mind, the bill, in the first instance, should have expressed it. If the restrictions are objected to, based upon such broad and plain policies, we have the right to assume that there must be some reason for the objection. I gather from the gentleman's statement that because we can not foresee the future he thinks the time may come when we ought to make loans to neutral countries of a portion of this $3,000,000,000. My answer to that is that if that time should come the Congress of the United States should settle that question when it arises. But for the present, we should confine our loan of this $3,000,000,000 to the allies, to those who are now engaged in war fighting our enemies.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. HILL. I think there should be an amendment, but I think it should be much broader than the gentleman's amendment. Let me make the suggestion: It is a well-known fact that Germany has financed Bulgaria and Turkey to go into the war.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. HILL. What objection would there be if the Presiden acting in harmony with the legislative power of the Gover ment, as I think should be done, financed Turkey and Bulgaria to get them out of the war? [Laughter.]

Mr. LENROOT. There may be no objection whatever. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, if the United States is to enter upon that kind of a proposition, we are entitled to act upon that proposition and let the legislative branch of this Government decide it. [Applause.] And it is not an authority that ought to be granted to the administrative side of this Government.

I am heartily in accord with the purpose of loaning the money of the United States to those who are engaged in war, either now or hereafter, with our enemies, because then the loan of that money clearly helps the United States to a successful prosecution of the war. But I am not willing to vote and I shall not willingly vote any authority to the administrative side of this Government to make loans of the money of the United States to neutral countries that are doing nothing to help the United States fight this war, until such time as the facts may be brought before Congress and Congress can intelligently act upon such facts.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, as I said before, I sincerely hope that at least some of the amendments I have suggested will be adopted and, if so, I shall be glad to vote for the bill. It seems so clear and so plain that these loans ought to be restricted, not to specific countries but to countries that are making common cause, so to speak, with us, that by fighting are helping the United States to win her fight, that there ought not to be the slightest objection to placing a restriction of that kind in the bill. And, second, there ought not to be the slightest objection to the termination of this tremendous authority, necessary in war time, just as soon as peace shall be declared. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I shall not at this time undertake to reply definitely to the suggestions made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. I do not believe that even by the statements of individual Members we should commit or attempt to commit this bill to amendments which can not be considered more in detail than is possible by having them stated on the floor now.

I am somewhat in sympathy with what the gentleman has said touching the termination of this power to make this foreign loan being coincident with the termination of war with Germany; but from a very hastily formed judgment of the amendments that he has proposed touching a curtailment in the exercise of the power during the time that it shall exist, I am of the opinion that the amendments suggested would go very much further than the gentleman from Wisconsin himself would desire to go in restricting the power of the President in negotiating these loans.

I think it is perhaps fortunate that we shall not be called upon to vote upon this bill and its amendments until to-morrow, and in the meanwhile proper consideration can be given to the matter, and a decision reached as to whether any amendment should be offered along the line suggested by the gentleman.

But I asked the time of the committee, not with the intention of discussing that phase, but very briefly to call attention to the strength of America in connection with the very great loan that it is proposed shall now be financed at a very low rate of interest.

The sums that we are dealing in are so gigantic that it is impossible for the mind really to grasp their meaning by any thought other than a comparative one.

We are proposing by this bill an issue of $5,000,000,000 of bonds, $2,000,000,000 of certificates, and the reissue, or rather the issue under new terms, of $472,000,000 of bonds now authorized to be issued, all to bear interest at three and a half per cent.

The bonded debt of the United States at this time amounts to $973,357,250, so that if all of the bonds and certificates of indebtedness are issued which will be authorized after this bill shall have become a law we will have outstanding an indebtedness of bonds and certificates of debt of $8,445,357,250, a sum so tremendous that, I repeat, it is impossible for the mind to grasp the significance of it except when used in terms of comparison. And yet, in my judgment, that bonded and certificated indebtedness does not represent a fraction of the strain upon the credit of America that was represented by the indebtedness that existed at the close of the Civil War.

At the close of the Civil War the wealth of America, roughly, amounted to something like $20,000,000,000. In 1860 it had been estimated at $15,000,000,000, and in 1870 it was estimated at $30,000,000,000. I think it is a fair and liberal statement to say that the wealth of America at the close of the Civil War did not exceed $20,000,000,000. Yet at that time we had a bonded indebtedness of $2,381,530,000 and we had an outstanding noninterest-bearing debt of $456,000,000.

The interest that we were required to pay upon our bonded debt at the close of the Civil War amounted to $150,977,000 per annum. The interest that we would be required to pay if all of this $8,000,000,000 of indebtedness should be issued under present conditions would amount to $284,974,000. In other words, assuming that we can make these issues upon the rate of interest that is being prescribed in the act of 3½ per cent, we would have an annual interest charge upon this indebtedness that would not be equal to twice what the interest charge was upon the national debt at the end of the Civil War. Yet as against a national wealth of $20,000,000,000 at that time we have now a national wealth that has been estimated at from $200,000,000,000 to $250,000,000,000. When that is borne in mind, when the tremendous wealth of this country is contemplated, the issue here proposed, gigantic as it is, and without precedent, yet it presents much less of a strain upon the ability of the country to absorb the bonds, and of the Government subsequently to take care of the interest and provide for their retirement, than was required as to bonds outstanding at the close of the Civil War.

In the brief time that I have I can not submit the figures I have gathered touching the wealth of the allied powers that are at war with Germany; but great as is their expenditure, tremendous as is the bonded indebtedness that has been created by those countries since the beginning of their war with Germany, they have yet not reached a period in financial indebtedness that would warrant the belief that they will not be able to meet both the interest and over a course of years the principal of their debt. In considering these sums the trouble is that we are apt to forget also the tremendous increase in the wealth of the world and in the productive capacity of man. Man to-day is capable of producing wealth in manyfold more quantity than he could a few decades ago, and the wealth of the whole world has so increased that, notwithstanding the tremendous burden that this war is placing upon these countries, there is no reason in my judgment to believe that the allied countries can not or will not provide for their debt and its interest. The condition that confronts Great Britain to-day is not worse, if it be as acute, as that which confronted her at the termination of the Napoleonic wars. But in the very brief time that I have I may not go into the detailed statements that would warrant the conclusions I have so briefly given to the House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Just for a moment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the belligerent countries borrowing from us are able to pay their debts, then $3,000,000,000 of this loan is practically equalized and takes care of itself.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no doubt that the $3,000,000,000 of loans, if made as I believe they will and should be made to the chief nations engaged in war with Germany, will be repaid, principal and interest. But in stating to the House the obligation upon the country and the Government in the way of financing the interest and principal of these bonds I have preferred to count them directly as obligations of the Government, without alluding to the offset of $3,000,000,000 that will come by virtue of a similar payment in interest and an ultimate payment in principal by the allies to whom we make the loan.

But the point I want to impress upon the House and the country before taking my seat is this: Great as is the power of America to carry this indebtedness and provide for the interest, no more fatal mistake could be made than to postpone the collection of greatly increased amounts of money by taxation for the conduct of this war, and for the ultimate retirement of these bonds. The one fatal mistake that was made by the Government in the Civil War was the delay—a delay which grew out of a distrust of the people which was not warranted by the fact—in the imposing of heavy taxation in order to gradually increase the income of the Government; and it was only after we had been at war for several years that the Federal Government began to raise anything like the proportion it should have raised by taxation of the funds necessary to carry on that war. We ought to determine that immediately upon the passage of this bill authorizing this great bond issued there shall follow it a taxation measure sufficient to raise a great proportion of the expense of conducting the war in the months that are to follow. Unless we do that, the very issuance of this tremendous amount of bonds will have a tendency to greatly inflate all business in America, to make prices soar, to lead to extravagances that can breed only harm and weakness to the Republic; and if we are to profit by experience that history dictates, we will accompany this legislation with taxation sufficiently heavy to let this generation realize now some of the burdens that grow out of the war, and I have sufficient faith in the patriotism, in the loyalty, in the devotion of the people of America to know that they are ready and anxious to bear their share now of the burden necessary to successfully conduct a war that they believe the honor of the Nation required the making and the safety of the Nation requires winning; and I hope that we will not hear complaints by Members here of excessive taxation. The danger that confronts the Congress is not that it will tax too heavily this generation, but that it will not tax heavily enough, in order to properly safeguard the true interests of America. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], a member of the committee.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it has been quite truly stated that, in comparison with any other sums heretofore authorized or expended, the amount provided by this bill is prodigious. In the last days of the Civil War, when we had nearly a million men in the field, our expenses were only about $3,000,000 per day, and the total expenses of the National Government for the whole of the Civil War were about $3,200,000,000, small indeed by comparison. But a comparison more useful for our purposes can be found in considering the expenses of carrying on this war as now being shown by the budgets of those nations engaged in it. Since the beginning of this war down to the 10th of March of this year Great Britain had expended about $20,600,000,000, of which about $4,565,000,000 have been loaned to her allies. Since April 1 of last year, which would be approximately the last year of the war, Great Britain has expended something over $10,000,000,000, part of that also in the form of loans to her allies.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has proposed an amendment to prevent any of the bonds provided by this bill being sold after the war. While I am in sympathy with the purposes of his amendment, I would call the attention of the House to the fact that the amount provided for by this bill, immense as it is, will finance the war on the part of all of the allies for but a few months. As I have said, I am in accord with the principle of the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, but I would carry that principle further. I think there ought to be an amendment to this bill in the line of the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] a few days ago to the effect that there should be a committee appointed on the conduct of the war, which should supervise the loaning of this money, this immense sum of $3,000,000,000, which under the terms of the bill as it now stands is to be loaned to foreign governments without any restrictions being made by Congress. To what purpose it shall be applied or to whom it shall be loaned is not specified. I shall propose an amendment later on to remedy this defect, but whether that amendment be carried or not, I expect to support the bill. The question is now whether the bill shall be adopted, and on that question I must unhesitatingly answer yes.

Mr. Chairman, we need money now. We can not wait for the slow process of taxation. We must act. The fatal weakness of republics have always been indecision, division, and delay, while the mailed fist of a military despotism strikes swift and far and hard. We have seen its blows fall like lightning. It struck here and a kingdom disappeared; it struck there and a nation was wiped from the face of the earth. What of Belgium, Serbia, and Roumania now? Where are their Governments, their rulers, and their statesmen? Exiles in a foreign land.

Where are their armies that once formed more than 2,000,000 of effective fighting men? Scattered, captured, destroyed, disorganized, no longer an effective fighting unit. Lloyd-George said not long ago that ever since this war had begun, everywhere there had dogged the footsteps of the allies the mocking specter of "too late." The allies were too late in Belgium, too late in Serbia, too late in Roumania, too late at the Dardanelles. Too late everywhere for the first two years of the war. Shall we wait now until another of those nations who are cooperating with us in this war has been overwhelmed and we also shall be too late? Shall we continue to debate, to dispute, to disagree until the time for effective action is passed, or shall we act now? I say that now is the time for effective action and the only time.

We have ourselves recently experienced how swift and dreadful could be the attack of a military autocracy. How long was it after Germany had issued its order with reference to our ships and told us that they would be destroyed if they violated that order before the threat was carried into execution? Only a few short weeks intervened before the shattered bodies of our citizens strewd the waves, mute evidence of the relentless and remorseless energy with which our adversaries prosecute the war. Even while we discuss this measure, short as time is, a vigilant and ever-active foe is taking measures to crush its enemies by exerting its power to the utmost. The military strength of Germany is now at its maximum. Its armies in the field are greater than ever before. We must see that the strength of the allies does not diminish.

On the Far East front a nation has received a new life. Russia has thrown off the shackles of despotism and tyranny. It rises with a new strength and in its veins pulses the spirit of freedom. It is a giant in power and in resources, but, however strong it may be, it can not fight without arms and without ammunition, and I might say, also, without money. On the western border of Russia there is assembled to-day a great German army ready to spring upon its prey as soon as the barrier of winter is removed. Is Russia ready to meet the attack? Not as it should be. Its Government has been recently revolutionized; it has experienced the disorganization that must follow after a revolution. The staggering task confronts the new Government of forming new systems, of administration, and perfecting a new system of taxation. It needs money as well as materials and munitions, and in my judgment it ought to have them. A wall of steel surrounds to-day the Empire of the Hohenzollerns, but that wall is no stronger than its weakest section. If one section gives way, the whole will crumble, and we will be left to sustain alone the attack of that power which has for more than two years and a half successfully defied the greater part of the armed forces of the whole world. The time has come, I repeat it, for action for the benefit of those nations that are so sorely, so hardly pressed; and which are now fighting our battles.

Mr. Chairman, having declared war, we must now carry it on. And how? We can not at this time send troops to Europe, for we have no Army to send there. We can act against the German forces on sea alone, but there their submarines lurk in darkness and hide beyond our reach in the depths of the ocean. Just now Germany can not send troops to attack us here. It can only strike us upon the ocean by some submarine that escapes the search of the fleets that are hunting for it. There is, however, another way that we can act effectively, and it is the only way we can act effectively. We can furnish money to the allies for the purpose of establishing credits here that will buy them munitions and supplies and for other purposes, if necessary, for them to successfully carry on the war. In modern wars the financial burden is so overpowering that it is not unlikely that the last dollar may determine the winner. At all events a nation whose credit is gone can not successfully carry on modern war. I can not agree with my colleague [Mr. TOWNER] that we should not loan money to the allies. Money is the only effective weapon that we possess at this time, and it would, in my judgment, be a fatal mistake not to use it.

In the few moments that may still be left to me I shall call the attention of the House to the necessity for the amendment to the bill which I suggested in opening. During the time of the Civil War there was, as everyone knows, a committee appointed for the conduct of the war. I think that such a committee ought to be provided for now, and I say that it implies no distrust to the President nor distrust of his Cabinet when we suggest its appointment.

Rather would it imply that as we have granted confidence, and all confidence, to the President in passing this bill, that we are merely asking that he give some confidence to us. I know, of course, and every gentleman knows, that all the details of these matters can not be spread before the public at large nor even before the Members of this House, but a select committee could determine as to where this money should go, could settle all of the questions that have been raised here in debate, and obviate the objections which have been made as to the possibility of a misuse of this money. It could defy all slander. It would be known that in these men the leaders of the House and the leaders of the Senate there rested sufficient wisdom and sufficient judgment to properly manage and control this great fund. The task is too great for any one man. I repeat that it implies no distrust of anyone when we ask that some opportunity should be given to us——

Mr. LANGLEY. Does not the gentleman think such an arrangement would in reality carry out the spirit of that provision of the Constitution which vests in Congress the power to declare war and to make appropriation for it?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I agree with the gentleman. I also say that in my judgment we ought not to part with our powers as under this bill we will if it should be adopted in its present form. But I do not care to pursue this argument further at this time. I shall call the attention of the committee to it later when the proper time comes to offer amendments. I have intended to and I feel that I must vote for this bill, even though it be not amended as I desire, for I believe if my amendment is not adopted here its purpose will in some manner be carried out by the Senate. What we wish to do, what everyone desires to do, is to make the war short and decisive. If we vacillate or delay, we will prolong it, and perhaps prolong it fatally. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have not any idea I shall use all the time yielded me. I make no pretense of being an expert in financial matters, and shall not attempt a learned discourse on that subject. In the beginning let me announce I shall vote for this measure if no better one is devised. I shall, however, utter a protest against some provisions of the bill that seem to me should find lodgment in the minds of the representatives of the American people. I want to protest against the bond provision—I want to protest against a bond issue at all. Do not misunderstand me. I am perfectly willing that we shall raise the money necessary to do our full part as belligerents in this war in which we are now engaged, and do so now. I feel that when we haggle about the cost of war, that, in a measure, we belittle ourselves, as though dollars were more sacred than honor and more to be considered than the security and safety of our country. Therefore, what I shall say will not be against the amount of expenditures here contemplated, but to the manner in which we propose to raise these funds. I have heard gentlemen on the Republican side of the House proclaim again and again in your opposition to revenue bills brought into this House since I have been a Member of it, that direct taxes were passed down to the ultimate consumer, to the producer, to the poor people. You made that statement even in reference to the provisions of the 8 per cent excess profits tax contained in the revenue bill passed in the closing days of the Sixty-fourth Congress. In a measure I agree with you. Wealth has a way of shifting burdens of taxation to those least able to pay. Finance this war by a bond issue and the entire cost of the war—every dollar of it—will finally be paid by the people who fight the war. It will be paid by the poor people of this country. Wealth will not suffer at all by reason of the tremendous expenses made necessary in waging this war. You propose now to issue bonds—$5,000,000,000 worth—bearing interest at the rate of 3½ per cent.

Will wealth seek this investment offered in these bonds? Yes; and gladly do so. Call money on the 9th day of this month in New York was 2½ per cent. Time money was from 3¼ to 3¾ per cent. Now, this is money seeking investment in the open market. Taking the risk of not being employed all the time and not having, therefore, an earning period of 365 days in the year, at the same time it was subject to bear some of the burdens incident to government. It can be taxed. It was seeking investment after this declaration of war had been made, in New York City, the great money market of this country, at 2½ per cent for call loans and 3½ per cent for time loans. It will, of course, fly to this city of refuge opened to it by the stupendous bond issue.

By this act we say to wealth: "We must have money to wage this war. We will therefore make a bond issue of $5,000,000,000. It will pay 3½ per cent interest and is exempt from every kind of tax except that of inheritance." Not much of it will be subject to that burden because most of it will be held by corporations, and they do not die. The result will be, as I said a minute ago, a city of refuge for the wealth of this country. It will be shifted out of the column of assets and transferred to that of liabilities and eventually be borne by our young men who go out and bare their breasts to the shot and shell of our country's enemies in this time of war. And by distributing it thus through the years that are to come wealth will escape even the slight burden of paying the meager salaries of these their own boys who die that our country may live. I fear it may find means of laying on them even the cost of arming and equipping them for this struggle and paying their pensions if they are disabled, if they shall be so fortunate as to come back at all.

The point I am trying to make is simply this, gentlemen, that we ought not to make this war, which we are waging in the interest of the people of this country, a war for liberty, a war for justice, a war for right, and a war for all those things for which America has stood through all the years, a means whereby the wealth of this country can actually increase its holdings, and the poor people of this country, compelled in the first instance to bear the brunt of the battle, in the second compelled through the years, and after them their children's children be compelled, to repay to the wealth of this country every dollar the war shall cost. You ought not to do it.

Just to illustrate what wealth is even now taking from the people of this country I refer you to the yearbook of Armour & Co., issued a few days ago. It shows that at the end of this fiscal year it had made a net profit of $20,100,000 on an investment capitalized at $100,000,000 and a reserve of something between $36,000,000 and $37,000,000. That does not represent all the earnings of this company. Included in its earnings, but not in its net earnings, was $7,500,000 of permanent improvements, or a net profit approaching 20 per cent upon its investment. Now, then, I do not see any particular hardship in requiring it to turn over these earnings to the country when the country needs these resources to carry on this war. I am not a socialist. I do not believe in confiscation, but I do not think wealth is more sacred than human life. If we require our young men to make the supreme sacrifice for our country, why should wealth complain if we also drafted it into service? Many of you gentlemen on the Republican side of the House have been advocating what you call the selective draft, which, in my judgment, is the most obnoxious way of getting soldiers that could possibly be devised. At least, if you are to draft men you ought to follow the old plan that was adopted during the war between the States, of putting white and black beans in a box and let every man have a fair chance. If we compel our young men to gamble with death, let us not use loaded dice. Let lot determine who shall serve and who not serve. But your selective draft system, of course, means simply this, that anyone who can convince the department that he is necessary to the industry of the country, that he can best serve by staying at home, will be excused.

The man who has not yet made a place in the world for himself will be conscripted and sent abroad. It means the boys from the farms and those from the mines and from the workshops who have not acquired skilled trades will have their places taken by others too old to serve in the ranks or those who are physically unfit to serve, or maybe by women, and these young men will be drafted under this selective system and sent to the war. The rich, the skilled laborers, the high-salaried men, or those who can run automobiles and lead the dance—it will be found necessary for them to stay at home, and they will stay. They will have, if rich and powerful, provided for them some fictitious job. They will escape the selective draft. The poor, the dumb—not dumb in that they have no power of articulate speech but dumb because they have neither wealth nor powerful friends—they will fall victims of this selective draft.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. Did I correctly understand the gentleman to say that somebody on this side of the House had suggested the selective draft?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes, sir; I said that.

Mr. LANGLEY. Why, I thought it was a suggestion that came from the President. I have not heard of anybody over here suggesting it. I know I have never made such a suggestion, and I would not vote for it as a separate proposition.

Mr. CARAWAY. It seems that I have heard the gentleman say many times he would not vote for a thing; then I have looked in the RECORD and been surprised to find that he did vote for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. I did not quite understand the gentleman. I do not understand to whom he is referring, but I suppose he must have had himself in mind.

Mr. CARAWAY. I thought I was referring to my good-natured friend from Kentucky.

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not recall any instance of that kind, where I have talked one way and voted another, but——

Mr. CARAWAY. Look in the RECORD.

Mr. LANGLEY (continuing). If I ever did, I have some distinguished precedents for a wise man changing his mind once in a while.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. ALMON. I would be glad if the gentleman would continue a little further and explain as to his understanding of what is meant by "selective conscription" that we read so much about in the newspapers, and what the gentleman understands to be the practical workings of it as the term is commonly used.

Mr. CARAWAY. I was just trying to explain what I thought it was and what the practical result of it would be. Selective conscription, as I understand it—of course, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] can set me right if I am wrong——

Mr. LANGLEY. I will, if you make a mistake. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARAWAY. It means the right to conscript by selection. I understand the age suggested is from 19 to 25 years; that every man between these ages who is physically sound is subject to conscription. A military survey of this country is to be made to ascertain how many men are subject to military duty within the limitations I have made, then the department has the power to determine which of those who are liable to service shall go.

If one man is thought to be more necessary to an industry at home than another, the officer who is in charge of that particular district has the discretion to take which of the two he pleases. It will, as I honestly believe, take the unskilled laborers from the cities and the farm laborers from the fields and leave to the highly organized industries all their skilled people, and to leave at home all those people who happen to have sufficient influence to convince the officer in charge, whose duty it is and whose right it is to exercise this right of selective draft, that they should be left at home—and their neighbors' sons should go. It opens the door to favoritism. It is undemocratic and subversive of liberty. Under it I should be very much surprised indeed if any rich man who had a chauffeur who drove extremely well should lose him. [Laughter.] I should also be much surprised if any widow who had an only son who had no particularly skilled calling and no powerful friend should be able to keep him. I would not, however, endanger my country or retard its forward march to victory for the sake of any views I hold.

That is not, however, what I wished to discuss. It was bond issues; and however poorly I may be able to present my ideas, I wish to impress upon you this idea, war ought to pay as it goes. It is not right to shift this burden of repayment to some other age and generation. We ought to be men enough to fight our wars and pay our bills as we go. If you do that, the wealth of this country will fight its country's wars, so far as money can fight at all, because if by taxation and not by bond issue is raised a sufficient fund to meet the burdens of war as they arise, wealth can not pass down this great burden suddenly laid upon it to the consumer, the poor people of this country, who will at that time be at the front fighting the battles of this country. Wealth will then be compelled to do what it ought to do—pay the expenses of the war as they arise. But if you provide a bond issue wealth will not be one dollar the poorer by reason of the war. On the other hand, it will have been furnished a profitable investment, exempt from taxation, and the repayment spread over long years of time. Wealth will then do what wealth has always done in every war since the world began—profit by war—and the people who fight the battles of the country, who risk their lives, and who frequently give up careers and return, if they are fortunate enough to survive the conflict, broken in health and robbed of the opportunity to win place and preferment in society, will have the burden incident to financing the war shifted to their shoulders and the shoulders of their children down to the third generation. That is what will happen if you have a bond issue. But if you say, "Gentlemen, this is a war that we did not seek. It is rendered necessary to maintain our national honor. You have more at stake than any other class, because if this country loses the war and an indemnity has to be paid to the victor, the burden will fall upon you, as it did in Belgium. You must raise, then, many millions of dollars." The result would be a resort to the banks and the resources stored there. Wealth, then, has most at issue and ought not to be so unpatriotic as to wish to shift the cost of the war to those who defend wealth.

The resources of this country right now will finance the expenses of this war without business being seriously disturbed. I am not, however, so solicitous about the business of this country now as I am about my country's safety and the future of those who have made my country. Last March the national banks of this country had resources of $15,979,000,000. They had deposits of $12,957,000,000. Incidentally I think a man who is able to have a bank account and is a stockholder in a bank is not a pauper. [Laughter.] The resources of the State banks are about 2 to 1 as compared with those of the national banks. The resources of the banks, therefore, are sufficient to meet every emergency of this country now and not seriously disturb business, because money that is lying idle in banks is not doing anything particularly for industry.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman believe it is necessary now, in order to encourage those that are fighting with us against Germany, to make this loan?

Mr. CARAWAY. I would not hesitate to make it.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman believe that it is possible for Congress to pass a taxing measure at this time that will provide the money in time to let the allies have it, as contemplated in this bill?

Mr. CARAWAY. If you will allow me, dealing with the words used, "possible for Congress to pass it," I may say that there are some four hundred and thirty-odd of us, and we have so many different viewpoints as to what is right that it may be impossible to pass such a measure. I do not think there is anything wrong with the plan or that the plan is not feasible, but many people think wealth is sacred and should not be interfered with. They seem to think our country has grown great by means of wealth and that he is unclean who would dare lay hand on it even in times of national peril. I do not share these views and do not sympathize with those who do. I believe that flag is the emblem of liberty, of honor, and justice, not the refuge and protector of mere dollars. I do not think the gentleman from Texas entertains different views.

Mr. GARNER. May I say to my friend that I am one of those who believe that as large an amount as possible in the way of taxes should be levied toward supporting this proposition, but I do not believe it is possible to devise a scheme whereby you can get $7,000,000,000 within six months by taxation.

Mr. CARAWAY. To start in with, there is now in national banks in the United States, that somebody can draw a check against, the sum of $12,000,000,000.

Mr. GARNER. How would you levy a tax to reach that?

Mr. CARAWAY. And if somebody is unwilling to draw his check, I am willing to write a law to draw it for him, in his name, and leave him a receipt in place of his deposit. Of course, this is used as an illustration.

Mr. HICKS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that that $12,000,000,000, because it is on deposit, is lying idle in those banks?

Mr. CARAWAY. I should not think it was doing anything except drawing interest.

Mr. HICKS. Does not the gentleman think it is being used in commerce all the time?

Mr. CARAWAY. Possibly some of it is; but commerce is not such a sacred thing as human life and human honor, or national life and national honor, and we owe something more than just defending the country. The people, in the last analysis, constitute the country. It is not mountains and rivers and valleys that make this country. It is not the material things. It is the sense of justice, of right. It is the obligations that rest upon us to make the opportunities equal to all of the people under our flag, and we do not do it if we furnish a refuge for the rich in times of war and let them escape all the burdens incident to the defense of our country, and lay all those burdens upon the poor people of this country.

It is estimated among the expenses incident to waging this war that it is going to cost this country 30 cents a day to feed each man who actually does the fighting at the front. It costs about $195 apiece to equip each man. Therefore you can see that it is going to cost but 50 cents a day to maintain each fighting man. Now, the man at home drawing an income of thousands of dollars per annum should be willing to pay all above a reasonable sum into the Public Treasury at this time, and I am willing to compel him to do so. I think any man who at this time is getting more than is absolutely necessary to maintain himself and those dependent upon him free from want should not complain if he is compelled by law to contribute the remainder of his revenue to the defense of his country. No patriotic man should want to avail himself of opportunities to make profit while his country faces so great a peril. I do not believe any good man does.

Let us make sacrifices now, that we may hand down to our children the blessings of a free country and the honor, confidence, and respect of all those who live beneath its flag. Let us write in connection with this bond bill a law that will raise from the resources of this country enough to pay the burdens of this war as they arise. Let us make this in very truth a war of human rights and human justice. Let us make more sacred still every star and stripe of that flag beneath which our fathers fought and for which our fathers died. Let us not stain a single fold of it by greed or sully one star in its azure field by any selfish act of ours. Let us fight our fight and pay our debts and leave to our children a heritage more precious than gold. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] 15 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I had not intended to discuss this proposition, but a few remarks made by the next to the ranking Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee seemed to challenge attention. For that reason I desire to submit a few observations.

The gentleman to whom I refer, Mr. GARDNER, of Massachusetts, especially deprecated any attempt whatever to amend this measure. It seemed in its original form to have some sacredness that appealed to him, and that would prevent pagan hands from touching it. After that he made the statement that he would be a rubber stamp. I would not make such an admission for half the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. I regret that the distinguished Member should stand before this body of men and admit himself to be a rubber stamp, an automaton. But I was glad that he said it, because the other most important remark that he made was the call to the trenches of the boys of America. I am right glad to have it go out to the country that the first Member of Congress who stood upon this floor and called for conscription to the trenches was the gentleman who acknowledged himself a rubber stamp. Ordinarily men are called to the trenches by the blare of bugles, but in this particular case the call was by the soft, sibilant sough of the self-confessed rubber stamp of Massachusetts. [Laughter.]

Another reason why I do not, as a member of the Ways and Means Committee, allow myself to be considered as a rubber stamp is this, that I sought in that committee to amend this bill, which I expect to vote for; I thought it was our duty to amend it, especially in this case. The bill which is before you is not the product of the brain of any member of the Ways and Means Committee, but is the handiwork, so stated, of an administrative officer of this Government. This bill extends to him privileges never granted to any Secretary of the Treasury in the history of the Republic. When I say that I do not believe that he gave himself any broader privileges than any other Secretary of the Treasury might have given himself if he had had the opportunity of drawing the bill. I should probably have done it myself had I been in his place, for an administrative officer drawing a bill of this character would be inclined to give to himself a maximum of privilege with a minimum of restriction.

So we have this bill, and it is our duty under our oaths of office to examine it with critical eye throughout. For that reason I presented before the committee a number of amendments and reserved to myself the privilege to present on the floor of the House those and other amendments to this measure. I shall read those amendments, but shall not discuss them to-day. I shall endeavor to obtain a little time to discuss them to-morrow under the five-minute rule. But before I do that I want to say that I expect to support this bill in whatever form it finally reaches a vote. I do that because I think about these matters apparently a little differently from a number of Members of this body. Before the war resolution was voted upon I heard repeatedly on this floor and read from the press of the country a great deal about "standing up for the President."

At that time there was before us as the sovereign Congress of the United States a constitutional duty. If there was to be standing up for anybody, the President should have been standing up for the Congress, and the people should have been doing the same, instead of the Congress standing up for either the President or the people. But now, after the will of 431 Members, some opposed, many favorable, has been crystallized into this declaration of war, I deem it the duty of every Member of this Congress, in so far as they can, to subordinate his will and stand up for the President of the United States now in every sound and reasonable request, instead of doing so at the time when it was not his burden to bear.

The amendments that I shall submit are the following. I had prepared one in line with that presented by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and it was, of course, voted down in the committee. I shall not present it, but I shall leave it to the gentleman from Wisconsin to work out.

The first amendment I shall propose will be after the word "annum," in line 4, section 2, to insert the words "and shall run for a period not exceeding 10 years." I believe that if we ever collect any of this money from the countries of Europe we will collect it shortly after the close of the war, because then will be the time when they will be grateful, then will be the time when they will recognize their obligations, then will the generation on their part of the earth, knowing what their duties and obligations are, be in a position to carry them out.

The second amendment I shall present is to amend section 2 by inserting in line 21, of page 2, after the word "Governments"—and this refers to the President of the United States, that he shall advise or approve the Secretary's plan—"after he has been advised by the Speaker and the minority leader of the House of Representatives and the President pro tempore and the minority leader of the Senate." When I say that I make no reflection upon the present occupant of the presidential chair or the Secretary of the Treasury; it is entirely impersonal, because if this war extends during the time some people predict we may have two or three Presidents, and we may have many Secretaries of the Treasury. It reflects upon neither of these gentlemen, whomever they may be, to say that the burden of determining these great questions would be properly shared between the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the men occupying these commanding positions in this body and similar commanding positions in the other end of the Capitol, each representing the two great political forces of the Republic. I shall present also an amendment to strike out section 5, which is the convertible feature of the loan, and I shall argue that at that time. I shall submit another amendment in the last section by moving to substitute one-tenth for one-fifth where it occurs, and one-twentieth for one-tenth where it occurs, where found in section 7. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, it is highly significant of these mighty times that this bill, carrying the largest amount of money by far ever carried in a measure heretofore passed by Congress or by any legislative body in history, comes into this House backed by a unanimous report. The entire membership of the Ways and Means Committee, the only strictly partisan committee, with one exception, of the House, is as one upon this proposition. We are acting to-day not as partisans, not as Democrats or Republicans, but only as Americans.

May I be permitted to add that the nonpartisan spirit of these times was abundantly illustrated a few days ago when his most eminent and able, if not most bitter critic, called upon the President of the United States, and over clasped hands pledged him in this crisis his active and whole-hearted support.

We ask of you, our colleagues of this House, to support this bill in the same spirit, for we say to you with profound conviction that its passage is imperative if we are to make even a beginning at playing a man's part in the world events which are to come.

We must raise for military and naval purposes, and that immediately, in the neighborhood of $4,000,000,000. Of this sum it is proposed by this bill to provide $2,000,000,000 by a bond issue. The remaining two billion we must provide later by some new scheme of taxation. Whether it is an ideal system to divide evenly with posterity the cost of the war I shall not now pause to argue. I rather think myself that posterity should be called upon to pay a greater rather than a less proportion, but in either case a bond issue of at least $2,000,000,000 must be authorized at once.

In this bill we also authorize an issue of $2,000,000,000 worth of one-year certificates of indebtedness, but this is only to tide over the lean periods and stop up the gaps in the Treasury balance between times when interest and taxes are due and payable.

In addition to the $2,000,000,000 of bonds to be issued for our own immediate necessities, this bill authorizes the issue of $3,000,000,000 worth of bonds, the proceeds of which are to be used for extending credit to the allied powers.

I note that some question has been raised, notably by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], about this matter. I have assumed all along that this credit was to be extended only to the allied powers. I assumed that it would not under any circumstances be extended to any others, but if it shall be necessary to properly limit our extension of credit to those who are actively opposed to the enemies of the United States, I, for one, am perfectly willing to vote for such an amendment. The process of thus extending credit to these governments will be a simple and, I think, a just one. With the proceeds of the sale of our bonds we are to purchase from them, in such amounts as may be necessary, their bonds containing the same terms and conditions and bearing the same rate of interest as ours.

In no other way could we at this time so effectively aid these Governments, for we will be advancing to them huge sums of money at a rate of interest nearly one-half less than they are now compelled to pay.

Whatever may have been our personal views, gentlemen of the House, of the rights or wrongs of the European conflict, with whatever contestant our personal sympathies may have abided, whether we desired to enter the conflict or not—and there were few, indeed, who openly expressed such a desire—whether when the final test came we voted for war or against it, the fact remains that we are now at war, and that with the greatest and most efficient military power in history.

Let no man minimize the importance of the course we have embarked upon. Let no man pooh-pooh the seriousness of the situation. The time has come when no American, within this House or out of it, must fail to do his full duty. This is no frivolous affair, gentlemen. It is the biggest game we have ever started to play. Let us play it like men and Americans. The cause of the allies is now our cause. Let us do everything possible to promote it. Their victory will be our victory; their defeat may mean our defeat.

This war is not of our own choosing. We enter it calmly and with no malice in our hearts. Heaven knows we have no hatred for the German people. On the contrary, we have nothing but the most friendly feeling for them. Their achievements in science and literature, in art, and perhaps more than all in music, are a part of American civilization. The sons of Germany who have cast in their lot with us have been, with their sons, among our most useful and loyal citizens, and I have not the shadow of a doubt, no matter what anyone may say, that in this crisis they are prepared to prove their loyalty. At the least I pledge you the sincere and unwavering support of every man—and there are thousands of them—of German birth or ancestry in the district I have the honor to represent in this House. It is not with the German people that our quarrel lies. It is not against them as a people that we shall wage war. It is only against that grim, inexorable military machine which crushes or attempts to crush all who oppose it, whether within or without its dominions, that machine which possesses neither soul nor conscience and which acts with total disregard either for the teachings of God or for the laws of man.

It is a big thing we are about to do to-day, gentlemen, a thing which only a big country could do. In comparison with the money carried in this bill all the financial transactions of the Civil War combined were comparatively insignificant. The $5,000,000,000 worth of long-term bonds we are about to issue represent a sum more than five times as great as our entire national debt.

We take this step calmly, with full knowledge of its seriousness, and with the profound conviction that the country is behind us. Above all, we act with the belief that the debt we are about to incur, stupendous though it is, is no greater than this, the greatest Republic of all time, owes to human civilization. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the stupendous amount carried in the bill under consideration staggers the conception of all of us. The $3,000,000,000 loan proposed as an aid to foreign governments shows the dire straits in which those governments are placed and the need of aid from this Government. From the very start of the European war it has been my set policy to do everything in my power to prevent our Government from becoming involved in the European catastrophe. I favored the McLemore resolution and voted against tabling it. I have no apologies to make for casting that vote. It was with one purpose, and that was to keep our country out of the European conflict. I voted the other day against the war resolution. Potent reasons prompted the 50 Members of this House in casting their votes against that resolution. But that resolution has now become the law of the land. It is our bounden duty here, since that resolution has been enacted, to regard Germany as our enemy.

There is no objection so far as the authorization carried in this bill providing the $4,000,000,000 necessary to enable our Government to wage the war against Germany. There is serious objection to the policy of our Government loaning $3,000,000,000 as an aid to any foreign government—objections vital to the very principles and policies of our Government since its establishment. I do not subscribe to the policy proclaimed by some that we are the chosen people to establish a republican form of government this world over. I believe firmly in adhering to the policy of our fathers of keeping aloof from European entanglements, and since the outbreak of this war my conviction is more set that that should be the policy rather than to depart from it when we can now see the consequences that might ensue in case we should depart from that long-established policy and precedent.

But there is further objection to this $3,000,000,000 loan in that as it is framed in the bill it is entirely beyond the power of Congress to vote. Congress has no authority to tax the people of this country to loan money to foreign neutral governments. If the authority is to be found anywhere, it is to be found in the war powers of Congress. The authorization for this $3,000,000,000 is found entirely in section 2. Scan section 2 as closely as you will and you will find no reference whatsoever that the authorization of the $3,000,000,000 is for war purposes. Congress has authority to vote this money to those governments now at war or which will become involved in war with Germany, but only to such governments. I expect before this bill is finally passed that an amendment will be adopted, which has been suggested earlier in the debate, to section 2, limiting these credits to those foreign governments engaged in war with the Imperial Government of Germany, and also the amendment suggested by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, to the further effect that the loan is in order more effectively to prosecute the war in which the United States is engaged.

The best writers on constitutional law are agreed that the war powers of Congress are not so plenary that they can go to any extreme in voting the money of the Government. They hold that Congress has the power of authorizing such means as are authorized for governments engaged in war under the law of nations. The authority as carried in the bill would grant the President the right to borrow money to loan to neutrals. Certainly, if we are going to vest this great authority in the President, it should be restricted to voting it to those governments which are now engaged in war with the Imperial Government of Germany.

I am not one of those who believe that we should place any restrictions on the President other than these proper ones which come within the scope of our legislative authority in the distribution and use of these $3,000,000,000. I have no sympathy with the suggestion that there should be a congressional cabinet to confer with the Executive as to the expenditure of these immense funds. We are not organized as a responsible parliamentary government. The execution of this law devolves under the Constitution on the President, and under the President, on the heads of the departments. It would be going far and in new fields for us now to try to annex the idea that a congressional body should be apart and parcel in determining the manner as to the distribution of this amount.

I hope that the term of these bonds will be but for a few years, as was suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. The severance of financial ties between our Government and European powers can come none too quickly at the close of the war, so that our Government will be free to follow untrammeled its historic course of aloofness from European entanglements.

Neither can I subscribe to the doctrine advocated by my colleague [Mr. LENROOT] in the colloquy had with him a few minutes ago, that this money should be loaned to governments as an inducement perhaps to involve them in this awful European struggle. The pity of it all is, as I view it, that just as the war was coming to a close we had to become involved. Do not be deceived. Our entering in the war, in my opinion, caused the war to be lengthened a year or two in the future. The die is cast. We have to do everything in our power now until Germany recedes from its position as far as submarine warfare is concerned to bring her to terms. I hope that the day is not as far distant as I think it is, but when that day comes I hope there will be some strong neutral power still on the face of the globe that has kept its peace, its good will to all concerned, so that it may participate at the council table in the arbitrament of the questions that will certainly be submitted sooner or later for determination. God speed the day when that time shall come. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee: This is a stupendous proposition that confronts us, but one that should readily command our support, for the very simple and manifest reason that it affords a workable plan to make immediately effective the preponderance of our wealth, and thereby bring to pass a speedy conclusion of this war.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has made some objections to this measure. These objections may be fairly styled fantastic. It is conceivable that some of the things that he suggests might conceivably happen, but if lawmakers should concern themselves to provide by anticipation against every conceivable and unlikely possibility, statute-making would be a task of gigantic prolixity. The possibilities that he suggests are so unreasonable, and so unlikely that practical people concerned with practical lawmaking, need not be disturbed by them.

He suggests we should not lend this money to any country, as I understand his proposition, except one that is at war on our side, and his argument, as I understood it, carried the implication that the loan should in some fashion guarantee that the country receiving it should continue to fight. But how can we secure such a guaranty? We might make a great loan tomorrow, to Italy, but we will secure no guaranty that a month, or six months later, Italy might not conclude a separate peace. I have no idea that such will be the case. I have no idea that any of the nations securing credit under this act, will be guilty of so gross a breach of solemnly plighted faith, as the negotiation of a separate peace. But we take that unavoidable, if unlikely chance.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I made no such suggestion as the gentleman now makes, in any form.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Did not the gentleman suggest that we should have some guarantee that our money should go to those people that were effectively aiding us in our new relation to this world war?

Mr. LENROOT. In the acceptation of the loan.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes. This country can not approach the Governments at war, and by the proffer of a loan undertake to tie them down in any way in order to the continued prosecution of the war. We must take our chances in that respect. We must aid the allies upon the theory that we are aiding ourselves, whenever we increase the ability of our new associates to wage successful war upon the common enemy. But having extended that aid. we can do no more. We must take our chances that anyone of our present allies may withdraw from the war at any time. It is further suggested that the money which we are asked to vote might be used to give credit to a nation not at war with Germany. Conceivably so, but highly improbable. So improbable that it may be fairly called impossible. The one main controlling purpose of this act is to give credit to the allies who are fighting our battle.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] suggests that there are many vital objections to this bill, but neither the gentleman from Wisconsin, nor any other gentleman has paused in this discussion to present these vital objections, or elaborate any solid grounds of opposition. What are the vital objections, if any, to this measure? Can it be pretended on this floor that the United States has the authority to raise money to send the sons of America to die in the trenches of Europe, and yet is without authority as a Nation to make effective the wealth of the Nation to conclude the war in another fashion, and thereby render it unnecessary for the blood of American boys to be shed on foreign soil? It is not conceivable that such can be the case. It can not be possible that the Congress possesses the authority to provide the means to equip gigantic armies, and send them to foreign service, an authority that has never been challenged, and yet is impotent to use that same means to accomplish decisive results in another and direct fashion, to hasten the course of the war to a victorious conclusion, and keep our soldiers out of the charnel house of western Europe.

Mr. Chairman, if we will approach this question with full appreciation of what we have in mind to accomplish, we will be impressed by the fact that the lavish use of what I have called "the preponderance of our wealth," is the one potent weapon that we can put to immediate account, as an effective instrument to hasten the end of this horrible war. What do the allied countries say they need? Credit, munitions, and food. We can mobilize our wealth at once, and by that mobilization set in motion streams of munitions and of food that will flow continuously across the ocean as an effective contribution to the allied cause, long ere it will be possible for this country to train and put on continental soil, an American army.

I am constrained to support a measure that will do these things, because they are practical things, and as such they commend themselves to me. These are the things that may be done at once, and once done they will hasten the day that will see the end of this unhappy strife. I am not so favorable to the proposition to raise gigantic armies. I do not believe than an American army of 1,000,000 men, much less 2,000,000, will reach Europe before this war is ended. If credence can be given to the experience of others, and the statements of experts from the battle fields of France, it is apparent that it will not be possible to train and equip an army of a million men for service in Europe inside of a year. Further, it would be impossible to transport this army and their equipments, to Europe, in less than four months. Having in mind the distance to be traveled, the number of men and the volume of equipment to be transported, and the number of transports required, the period of four months, is all too short a time for the task. This war will not last 16 months longer.

I am not underrating for a moment the strength, or the fighting capacity of Germany. Nor is she at the end of her resources. But on the other hand I am not overestimating her resources, or crediting her with superhuman powers. The course of this war, the comparative value of what has been done by the several nations engaged, and the condition of each as to man power, munitions, and food, may be ascertained with sufficient accuracy for a reasonable judgment from the Congressional Library. I have sought information, at the sources of available information and I am satisfied, as I believe every man will be satisfied, who prosecutes this inquiry in critical and methodical fashion, that the outcome of the Battle of the Marne settled in definite fashion the outcome of this war, and eliminated the possibility of ultimate German victory.

That was the greatest battle ever fought in the open in the history of nations, having in mind the number of troops involved, the destructive instrumentalities employed, and the issues at stake. And yet battling against great odds in this greatest of all battles, an inferior French and English force outmaneuvered, outfought, and overthrew with prodigious losses a superior German Army, driving them back in headlong rout for many miles, and putting an end for all time to the ambitious German plan of a short campaign in France. This plan was designed to crush the French Army at one gigantic blow. From this was expected to follow the fall of Paris, the capture of the channel ports, to afford bases of operations against England, and then the opportunity for a swift dash to the east to compass the destruction of the lumbering enemy on that frontier.

Whatever may be our differing judgments on other things, we must be all agreed that the Battle of the Marne was a great French and English victory at a time when the French and English had not attained the full measure of their strength. I do not discredit German courage. I do not discredit German manhood. I do not discredit German military skill. The armies of the Kaiser have fought magnificently. They have illustrated a thousand times as dauntless a quality of courage as was ever illustrated at famous Thermopylæ. They have illustrated tenacity as well as dash. They have been well led. But have in mind—those of you who have read and studied the history of this war—that neither in courage, dash, tenacity, or skill have the Germans exceeded their English and French competitors. From the day of the Battle of the Marne the power of France and England has been rising higher and higher, command of the seas has given them access to, and the opportunity to draw upon the resources of the world. Germany has had to live within herself, and feed upon herself in the execution of her gigantic task.

I give her full credit for all she has done, but when you credit the combatants with equal courage, equal skill, and equal incentives to endure to the end, then superior man power, superior resources, and command of the sea will not be denied. They spell an inevitable conclusion. Day by day we see the cordon around the central powers draws closer and closer. Day by day the forces within that circle are crumbling. Day by day hunger is doing its work. All of the contributing factors are operating with increasing force to bring Germany to her knees, and end this titanic struggle of appalling horror. And yet with the progress of this drama steadily developing before our eyes, and telling plainly the story of approaching defeat, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] advises us that our contribution to this war will merely serve to prolong the conflict for several years.

Is this the lesson to be drawn from the facts of this war which are available to every student of this cataclysmic contest?

Assuredly it is not the conclusion that I derive from these facts. Mr. Chairman, this country has been slow to enter this terrific war. I take it that there is scarcely a colleague before me who did not approach with reluctance the solemn decision that has added this great neutral country to the forces arrayed against the central powers. But having reached the decision forced upon us by the compulsion of the circumstances which surrounded us, we have thrown the tremendous resources of this country into the scales, and are determined to so use those resources as to achieve the most immediate and decisive results. I approve in one respect the attitude of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN]. I agree with him that Congress ought not to abdicate its right to determine the methods by which money should be raised, and men should be secured to prosecute this war. Far from it. It is our duty to determine these things, and to exercise our discretion in this determination.

But, gentlemen of the committee, now that we are in this war, it is our duty to press it to a speedy and victorious conclusion. Speed is of the essence in this matter. Shall we quibble and quibble, and raise fantastic objections to the use of the one asset that may be immediately mobilized for effective use? Shall we withhold an application of this asset that will not only put guns and munitions in the hands of the men who are fighting in Europe against the common enemy, but in addition will feed both the men on the firing line, and the men and the women at home who are supporting the men in the trenches. Shall we say that we have no authority to make this application but are empowered to expend far greater sums to train and equip our sons for war, and then send them to fight, and perchance to die in foreign lands? What of logic or reason can be ascertained in such a contention?

Mr. Chairman, I conclude as I began. This proposition, stupendous as it is, should command our support, as a sane and workable plan to make presently effective the preponderance of our national wealth to compass the speedy, and therefore the merciful conclusion of this war. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] 10 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a week ago to-day we were called upon to pass upon the most important question and to register the most momentous decision that any of us ever has been or ever will be called upon to decide, that of taking up the gage of battle thrown down by arbitrary and despotic power which had decreed slaughter and death to all who sought the lanes of the high seas, where, by all the laws of God and man, all have the right to go.

We decided then that we should take up the sword in the maintenance of our rights, for the protection of our citizens, and in the assertion of American might and honor. We are now called upon to take the first definite step in the carrying out of the policy then decided upon. Under these circumstances it is the duty, in my opinion, of each and all of us, whether we supported that decision or not, to support the means proposed to enable the American people to carry on the war which the American Congress, the representative of the American people, following the recommendation of the President, has decided upon.

I am not one of those who believe that we must necessarily take these measures word for word as they are presented to us. It is our duty to pass judgment upon their various provisions. This bill, in my opinion, ought to be amended in declaration of our purpose of providing for the national defense, in the raising of these enormous sums, in limiting the loans we may make to those who are at war with the Government of Germany, and in providing that loans shall not be made beyond the period we are engaged in war, however brief or however long that may be. I also believe an amendment should be adopted making it clear that this is not an appropriation bill authorizing general expenditures, but a bill authorizing the raising of funds to be used for purposes heretofore or hereafter clearly and and definitely authorized by law.

I for one am glad that it has been decided that our participation in the conflict, at the beginning at least, shall largely be in the way of strengthening the arms of those who are now so valiantly fighting our enemies. That is, in fact, the only way in which we can immediately and effectively enter the conflict. It is the only way in which we can at once and forcefully and effectively make our power felt. And I am one of those who sincerely hope that it is the will of Providence that our participation in the war need not go far beyond activities on the seas and aiding with money and supplies of those now engaged in the conflict.

We can not say, and we shall not say, that we will not send our forces to any battle front where they may be needed to accomplish the purpose of the declaration of the Congress; but we sincerely hope that we shall not be called upon to do that to the extent of sending men to fight overseas. But we can effectively and in the immediate future arm and strengthen and support those who are, since our declaration of war, fighting our battles. They have already been heartened and strengthened by our declaration of participation in the conflict, and if we can hearten and strengthen them further by large supplies of funds and strengthenings of credit it is our duty and to our advantage to do so.

I hope we shall not have to send men across the sea. If we do, I am one of those who think that the best men to send to fight our battles are the men who have the courage and patriotism to go and who are willing to volunteer for that purpose. [Applause.] I am not one of those who believe that an army composed largely of those who can only be brought to the colors under conscription are the best sort of folks to fight anybody's battles. [Applause.] I hope I shall never have to vote for conscription. Unless I am further persuaded than now, I shall not vote for it, at least until volunteering has been tried. If I ever do, I shall not lay the pleasing unction to my soul, as some gentlemen who have spoken on the subject evidently have, that there is to be a sort of selective conscription that will conscript everybody's constituents except their own. I have not lost faith in American youth. This is still a Republic. We have assumed the responsibility to meet the situation of war, but, after all, it remains for the American people to say how far war shall go and to what extent we shall participate in it. If it shall seem wise and proper and necessary at any time to send soldiers to do fighting in the trenches, which God forbid, I feel confident that there will be no difficulty in getting volunteers for that service. At any rate, I am one of those who, if it shall be necessary to furnish men for that service, want to give the volunteers a chance. [Applause.]

The sums provided in this bill are stupendous; the burden of its payment will weigh heavily on our people for many years to come, but it is the inevitable result of our entrance into the war. I voted with very great reluctance to accept the gage of battle the acts of Germany seemed to thrust upon us, and, having entered the conflict, we must not hesitate to pay the price, for hesitation or faltering now would be fatal.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized to borrow, from time to time, on the credit of the United States for the purposes of this act and to meet expenditures authorized for the national security and defense and other public purposes authorized by law not exceeding in the aggregate $5,000,000,000, exclusive of the sums authorized by section 4 of this act, and to issue therefor bonds of the United States.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry. There are three paragraphs in section 1. Will the bill be read by paragraphs or sections?

The CHAIRMAN. It is a revenue bill and will be read by paragraphs.

Mr. KITCHIN. I move that the committee do now rise.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. PADGETT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. Our Father in heaven, make us conscious of Thy presence, guide us by the light of Thy countenance, uphold us by the power of Thy might in every worthy object; that at the close of this day we shall hear speaking to the soul in commendatory terms the still small voice; in His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EMERGENCY BOND ISSUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 2762.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 2762, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2762) to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and to extend credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the first paragraph of the bill. Will it be in order now, or did the Chair hold——

The CHAIRMAN. The first paragraph has been read. The gentleman can send his amendment to the desk.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman withhold that a moment until I can offer a committee amendment to the second paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The second paragraph has not been read. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "aggregate," strike out the amount "$5,000,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the amount "$2,000,000,000."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] desire to be recognized in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes, sir. Mr. Chairman, I understand the position of the gentleman who offers this amendment is this: We are preparing to loan an enormous amount of money to the friends of this Government engaged in war with the enemies of this Government. The proposition contained in the pending amendment is that before loans are made to any nation the matter must be submitted to the determination of the 435 Members of the United States House of Representatives and of the Senators from each of the States, that a discussion must occur here as to the time the loan is to run, as to the amount of the loan, as to the terms of the loan in general, and as to whether or not that particular loan is advisable.

This bill drags its weary way through the Congress of the United States. Already in the making of the bill and in presenting it to this House we have occupied nearly 10 days of time. It is hoped that to-day this bill will pass the lower House of the Congress. How long it will take to pass the upper House no man can say. It will take to discuss each loan along the lines suggested by this amendment as much time as we are consuming now in determining upon this important war measure. To-day on the western front the greatest battle of the war is being waged. The entire force of the allied armies available for that purpose is being hurled against the Hindenburg line in northern France. To-day thousands of our friends and allies are dying in the trenches of northern France, and, according to the theory of this amendment, before we can loan to France a dollar we must discuss the matter at great length here in the Congress of the United States. While this awful war is raging and the very life of the States who are our friends are in danger we must permit all the Members of both Houses of this Congress to determine how much money we are going to let them have in this the hour of their national peril, in this hour when they are fighting our battle along the battle fronts of Europe. France did not treat us that way 140 years ago, when our credit was gone; when it cost $150 of American currency to buy a bushel of corn; when it cost $2,000 of American currency to buy a suit of clothes. She loaned to the impoverished young Republic of the western world millions from her Treasury at the request of the great Franklin without any discussion and without debate. And she sent her fleet and her armies, which finally led to the surrender over here at Yorktown and later to the end of that long war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to continue for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAINEY. And afterwards she remitted the interest. The millions she expended when she sent her armies and her fleet here in the defense of this young Republic in its natal hour we have never repaid. And yet the proposition is that while her young men are suffering and dying by the thousands our Secretary of the Treasury with his advisers, the Council of National Defense, shall not be permitted to determine, and to determine quickly, where these first bombs in this fight that we propose to wage shall be placed, because this proposed bond issue is the first battle in the great world conflict in which we are entering. This is the way the great Republic of the western world enters this awful war for freedom throughout the world. We enter it by here and now putting into the conflict $5,000,000,000 in money, by saying to those executives of this Government who are qualified and who are in possession of the desired information that they shall say how much we shall give to this nation, and when and how much we will give to this other nation, in order to produce the best results.

An amendment of the sort proposed here and pending now destroys absolutely and kills this bill. If we are to wage a campaign here in the House and let the representatives of these various nations who go to make up this great melting pot of ours suggest here that France shall have so much, that England shall have so much, that Italy shall have nothing at all in this loan, and proceed to wage this sort of a campaign here in this body, we might as well abandon this method of starting this fight. [Applause.]

The thing to do is to pass this bill and pass it quickly, and to say to the nations of the world engaged in the war with us, "We propose to help our friends, and we propose to do it quickly, and we propose to do it in the most effective way." [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAINEY. I do.

Mr. SABATH. Do I understand that there is an understanding, or that it is understood on the part of some Members here and others, that the loan is to be made only to three or four great powers and that the smaller nations that are at war should be eliminated or discriminated against?

Mr. RAINEY. There is no such understanding; there is no such intention. [Applause.] There will be nothing of that kind—no arrangement of that kind. In the changing battle fronts of Europe it is impossible to say this week where millions of this loan ought to be placed next week. We want this loan to be arranged so that it will be liquid; so that it will quickly and easily flow to that nation and to that battle front in the amounts that ought to be launched in that particular quarter. There is no intention to exclude any nation. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this amendment, but for reasons different from those assigned by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

I do not believe that time is wasted in considering these very important measures, and although four days have elapsed since this bill was introduced into this House, a single day's discussion has disclosed the fact that amendments of a vital and important character should be made to it, and will be made to it, before it is enacted into law. [Applause.]

I am not in favor of making this enormous loan upon the theory that we have initiated a program of helping some other nation in this great conflict. There is only one justification for the enormous burden that is now proposed to be put upon the people of the United States, and that is that this country is engaged in a war to maintain and to sustain its own rights as a Nation, and the fact that financial and other help is to be extended to some of the belligerents that are engaged upon the same side of the contest as the United States is merely incidental to the purpose in view. Whatever may have been the conduct of France in the past, however much we may have been indebted to her, or now sympathize with her, those facts alone would not be sufficient to justify the United States in engaging in this contest. We have been brought into this contest because one of the belligerents has committed repeated acts of war against the Government and people of the United States which compel us as a self-respecting and decent Nation to acknowledge that situation and to accept the challenge with which the Imperial German Government has confronted us. We are now initiating the measures that are necessary to conduct that war successfully, not to conduct some one else's war successfully, not merely to aid some belligerent in the accomplishment of its purpose except as that may be incidental and necessary in the accomplishment of our own purpose.

I would not hamper the administration in the negotiation of these loans. We happen to be arrayed on the same side with other nations. I should gladly vote to give $6,000,000,000 to the nations arrayed on the same side with us if we could win this war without sacrificing American blood and American lives. [Applause.] I have little sympathy with the suggestion that possibly we will not get our money back. I care not so much if we do if American blood and American lives be preserved by the grant of the money. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in this discussion suggestions have been made that in some way the Congress should attempt to limit the use to which the Governments to which this money is to be furnished may put it.

If we propose to help those Governments by extending credit and enabling them to get supplies, we can not quibble about what is to be done by them with portions of the money. [Applause.] It is a matter for them to determine. The only question for us to decide is whether it is advisable from our standpoint, for the successful conduct of the war in which we are engaged, to aid in the conduct of the war by the advancing of supplies of either money or men to those arrayed with us. When we decide to act we have done all that we should do. The details are administrative and must be intrusted to the executive department of the Government.

I do not wish at the outset of the consideration of these important measures to have the assertion or the intimation go unchallenged that it is a misfortune that under our Government there is such a thing as the Congress of the United States. [Applause.] The investigation conducted so far, in which I have had a part, justifies the assertion that the most important thing for the Congress to do is to be more assiduous, more searching, more careful in the performance of its duties than it has ever been before in the history of the Government. The more efficiently we do our work, the more we will lessen the burdens and responsibilities of the Executive and the more effective our Government will be. I do not believe that the time has come when because men may differ about terms of bills or suggestions as to what should be done they are to be criticized as obstructionists. I have a very keen realization of the duties that devolve upon me as a Member of this House, and I intend to discharge them according to my lights, regardless of public clamor or threats or attempted coercion from any source, and the sooner it is appreciated in every place that here is the one great forum where the American people are represented and where every man has the right and is under obligation to speak his views the better the country will be. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN and Mr. GARDNER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I will give way, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I did not know that I should speak upon the bill in any of its phases, because I doubted the necessity or desirability of speaking. But, Mr. Chairman, the amendment now proposed goes to the very basis of the proposition in the bill, as to our policy in regard to the war. The administration has proposed that it shall have the authority to loan $3,000,000,000 to those nations now engaged in war with the country upon which we have declared war. When we take the responsibility of engaging in war we ought not to expect that it will be a mere paper war or a mere academic discussion.

We are not prepared to place men in the field. We are not prepared to fight with our Army. We are not prepared to do very much with our Navy; not because we do not have some Navy, but because there is little opportunity for the Navy to engage in actual war at this time. But there is one way in which we are prepared to engage in the war. There is only one way in which to-day we can do more than make our war an academic discussion, and the only way left to us is to help finance those nations who are fighting our enemy. [Applause.] This bill will authorize the loan to them of $3,000,000,000. I doubt not that before a year has passed that sum will be more than doubled; but let us hope that by advancing our credit and loaning our money we may be able thus to end the war. I think it is our highest duty, in the making of war, to give aid to those who are fighting the enemy against whom we have declared war, and I only hope and pray that the aid thus given may be effectual enough to end the war before we send our boys to the trenches. [Applause.]

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] in his opposition to the Towner amendment. I do not agree with him as to the causes for which we are fighting. Neither does his President agree with him. I do not agree that the United States has gone to war merely to enforce its rights. I admit, of course, that Germany's submarine warfare has been the match which has lighted the conflagration in this country; but fundamentally the American people are actuated by a purpose even higher than the defense of our rights upon the high seas. The historians of the next generation will see with clearer eyes than ours. I venture the prediction that the future's broad survey of present-day American thought will show that the public opinion in this country which supports armed intervention in the affairs of Europe is based on a conviction that the entente allies are fighting for the rights of man and against a system of government which has become intolerable. Autocracy and democracy are engaged in a death struggle. We have taken up the sword on the side of democracy. It is high time for us to do so. Americans can not any longer permit other nations to bear the exclusive burden of a war for liberty.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. May we have the amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be reported again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. TOWNER: Page 1, line 8, after the word "aggregate," strike out "$5,000,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SHERLEY. Let us have a division.

Mr. MANN. Let us have a division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded. Those in favor of the amendment will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Three Members in the affirmative. Those opposed to the amendment will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Two hundred and seventeen Members in the negative.

So the question being taken, there were—ayes 3, noes 217.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I send to the desk an amendment which I offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SHACKLEFORD: Amend, at the end of line 10, on page 1, by inserting the following:

"That to provide funds for the payment of the bonds and other indebtedness of the United States created under the provisions of this act, in addition to the taxes now provided by law there shall be levied and collected upon all net incomes of persons in excess of $4,000 a tax of 1 per cent on the first $1,000 of such excess and an increase in the rate of such tax on a sliding scale on each succeeding $1,000 of such excess to a point which will not allow any person to retain an annual net income in excess of $50,000; and upon the profits of all corporations and joint-stock companies in excess of 8 per cent of their capital stock a tax of 8 per cent of the first 1 per cent of such excess and an increase in the rate of such tax on a sliding scale of 2 per cent on each succeeding one-fourth of 1 per cent of such excess to a point which will not allow any corporation or joint-stock company to retain an annual profit exceeding 12 per cent of its capital stock. The levy and collection of the taxes herein provided for shall not be continued after the bonds and other indebtedness of the United States created under the provisions of this act have been paid or funds sufficient for that purpose have been secured."

Mr. KITCHIN. I make a point of order against that amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina makes a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I do not care to argue it, any further than to say that it seems to me that at any time when we are providing for the issuance of bonds it ought to be in order also to provide a sinking fund for their payment.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course, this is not a tax measure at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's point of order is that it is not germane?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that clearly it is not germane. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bonds herein authorized shall be in such form and subject to such terms and conditions of issue, conversion, redemption, maturities, payment, and rate of interest, not exceeding 3½ per cent per annum, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. The principal and interest thereof shall be payable in United States gold coin of the present standard of value and shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation imposed by authority of the United States, or its possessions, or by authority of any State, except estate or inheritance taxes; but such bonds shall not bear the circulation privilege.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 2, line 3, after the word "interest," insert "including time of payment thereof," so that the line as amended will read:

"The bonds herein authorized shall be in such form and subject to such terms and conditions of issue, conversion, redemption, maturity, payment, and rate of interest, including time of payment thereof, not exceeding 3½ per cent per annum."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In my judgment this amendment is quite proper, and I agree with the rest of the committee; but it seems to me that it would fit better to have it read:

Rate and time of payment of interest.

Mr. MANN. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think that suggestion is all right, and I ask to modify my amendment so as to insert after the word "rate" the words "and time of payment."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Let the Clerk report the amendment as modified.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified committee amendment: Page 2, line 3, after the word "rate," insert the words "and time of payment."

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Under this amendment it only applies to the interest on the bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; because all the other conditions of the bonds are otherwise provided for.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is all it is intended to provide for?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. The amendment applies only to the payment of interest?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "prescribe," strike out the period and insert a comma and the following words: "and shall be redeemable at or before the expiration of 30 years from the date of issue."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this fixes a time for the redemption of these bonds. There is a suggestion in the country that we are leaving open the question of redemption in anticipation of the possible request by some of the foreign Governments to be released from the payment of their obligations. I do not understand that we are making a gift of the proceeds of our bonds which we apply to the purchase of foreign bonds. I understand it to be a financial transaction to prosecute our end of the war in Europe. I do not personally like the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] that those folks over there "are fighting our battles." That expression has been used quite commonly during the last two or three weeks, and it leads up to the inference that we are practically at the mercy of the belligerent nations and that the reason we propose to lend them the proceeds of our bonds is to reward them for "fighting our battles." My own view is that the foreign Governments are fighting their own battles and that we are aiding them.

My interpretation of our declaration that a state of war exists is that it was a declaration of an American war and that we are going in on our own account. If we bond ourselves and tax our people, as we are bound to do, we are doing it in our own behalf, though we may cooperate with the nations opposing Germany, because Germany is opposing us.

Let us grant that France was our friend in the Revolution, that Russia also has been our friend, and conceding that Great Britain is now our friend, although we have twice had difficulties with Great Britain, I am not yet convinced that any one of these countries is "fighting our battles" in the sense now commonly expressed or that we will not be able to fight our own. [Applause.]

When we lend these foreign countries money we are rendering them an assistance, and they are not rendering assistance to us. I believe we do not want entangling alliances of a political nature with any one of the belligerent nations, but we are willing to aid them financially. I am willing that we shall have financial transactions with them by which we may assist them in furthering their battles and that they may be allied to us in the declaration we have made of a war existing with Germany. But I would like them to understand that it is expected in due course that the obligations they make to us will be redeemed.

It is not desirable for us to say now that we propose to extinguish any claim we may have upon any foreign nation which we now assist. If we issue these bonds for an indeterminate period, we lay ourselves open to that suggestion. If we fix a time limit for redemption of the bonds, we make a financial transaction pure and simple. We do not at the outset, I take it, wish to have it understood that we propose to relinquish all claims upon such of the foreign nations as we are to assist.

Then, again, it is a customary thing in issuing bonds to fix a time for redemption. It affects the value of the issue. My amendment proposes that the bonds shall be redeemed in 30 years. If at the expiration of that time it appears that any foreign Government is in distress and still unable to redeem the bonds, there will be ample opportunity for it to come forward and say that it desires an extension of time; and if it has been a friend to us, I have no doubt the Congress of the United States will listen to any request that may be made.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In just a moment. Before doing so I wish to say that I have been informed that Great Britain, which probably will be the chief beneficiary of the proceeds of these bonds, has loaned $4,000,000,000 to her allies in this war, with the distinct understanding that it shall be paid back. Now, if we owe more to France and Russia than we do to England, and England is making her contract on business terms with her allies, it seems to be not unreasonable that we should put ourselves on a business basis to-day with those whom we intend to assist. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman's amendment relates only to the bonds issued by the United States. I would like to ask whether, if the bonds are subject to redemption at the will of the Secretary of the Treasury, it is his opinion that the bonds will find as ready a sale as if they had a fixed term?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is a financial question and could be better answered in the bond market than on the floor of the House. I am not speaking for the bankers; but I am of opinion that my amendment would apply to all bonds issued under this measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to disagree with my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. When he states that we are loaning this money to European nations to defend their interests in the war in which they are engaged, I think he stretches the case beyond the facts. We have already declared war, and we are not prepared to begin to fight the war we have declared. If we can find somebody else to fight the war for us with our money, we ought not to hesitate to grant them the credit which they want and must have. [Applause.]

There is no way to win this war except by men and money. We are not prepared to furnish the men to-day, and somebody else is prepared to furnish the men, if we furnish the money. I do not agree with the statement that we are furnishing this money for somebody else to wage war on their own account, but we are doing our part to wage the war in which we are engaged is the contention I make.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Do I understand the gentleman to mean that these loans we are going to make are not to be repaid?

Mr. MADDEN. I would not care whether they were repaid or not. We are starting out to win a victory, as I understand it, to maintain American rights; and if we can maintain American rights by furnishing money to somebody willing to fight our battles until we are prepared to fight those battles for ourselves, we ought to do it. We ought to begin the war upon which we have entered now, to-day, not to-morrow. We ought not to wait until we have enlisted an army that we can send over there. It will be a year before we can do that; but if we send our money to operate the armies that are already in the field, then we shall have done the thing that the American people are looking forward to us to do as their representatives.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows that if the foreign Governments do not pay the money they borrow from us the people of the United States will have to pay it.

Mr. MADDEN. I am one of the American people who is ready to pay my share of the obligation [applause], and I shall have to pay as much of the money that is to be raised in taxes as most of the men in the United States will have to pay, and I am ready to do it to the extent of every dollar I own. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is more fortunate than most of the others.

Mr. MADDEN. Most of the men who are not so fortunate will not have to pay the taxes, because the revenue that is raised now is raised by the income tax, and the men that have not the money, and the men who are not earning it, are exempt from taxation. The men who have the money ought to pay, and they are willing to pay. [Applause.] If the men who have not the money and who are able to fight, are willing to fight and offer their lives for the preservation of American honor and for the liberty of the world, then the men who are not able to fight, but who have had the good fortune to make money ought to help to pay the bill. [Applause.] The American people believe that the time for talk has passed, that the time for action has come, and for God's sake, let us get into action either through the armies that are already in the field or through the armies that we propose to raise ourselves. Every one knows that we will not have an army in the field for a year or more than a year, and our duty to posterity and to liberty is to do everything we can to-day to win victory for the American people and for the liberty of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, we are engaged in war with Germany, and we are strengthening, or arranging to strengthen, the credit of those nations engaged in war with Germany. We are not making this loan for the purpose of making an investment of our funds. We are making this loan in order to further our interests primarily in this world war, and from that moment when the Congress of the United States declared that a state of war existed between this country and Germany every blow struck at Germany by any of her enemies was struck also in our interest, because we have entered this war for the declared purpose of bringing it to a speedy conclusion, not for the purpose of territorial aggrandizement, not for the purpose of claiming for ourselves at the close of the war extravagant war indemnities. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] limits the period that these bonds are to run to 30 years. Perhaps that is long enough for some of them; perhaps it is too long for some of them. According to the information that we have, one nation to whom we may desire during the progress of this war to make loans expects to be able to pay the loan back in four or five years, but we have outstanding bonds now which run 50 years. The Panama Canal bonds run for 50 years, and some of these other bonds, not yet issued, mentioned in this bill run that long, which are to be issued now in accordance with the terms of this bill. The effect of this amendment will be to limit every one of them to 30 years—every unissued bond of the United States mentioned in this particular bill. The theory of the committee was that the Secretary of the Treasury and his advisers ought to have the opportunity to advise with the best financial thought of the country; ought to take the matter up with our diplomatic representatives in foreign governments, and then determine the period these bonds ought to run. Some of them ought to run, perhaps, for 50 years, and perhaps some of them ought not to run that long. Some of those bonds for which we are providing a reissue, according to the terms of this bill, ought to run as long as provided for in the original acts, in all probability. We think the amendment ought to be defeated.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think there should be any limitation of time at all?

Mr. RAINEY. I think there should be no limitation expressed in the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman object to a 50-year period?

Mr. RAINEY. I think they ought to be limited as appeals to the best judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury and his advisors at the time the bonds are issued and the loans are made, and he, of course, will consider the economic conditions prevailing in the nations we are assisting with these credits at the time the credits are extended.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not understand certainly, and the bill now before us does not support the idea, that we are giving this money away?

Mr. RAINEY. Certainly not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We ought to get something for the money we spend.

Mr. RAINEY. We never borrowed any money even from France that we did not pay back, although we did not pay back the interest.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman object to a 50-year limitation?

Mr. RAINEY. I object to any such limitation in this bill. I think the Secretary of the Treasury——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Do we not leave the whole question open to the suggestion which certain people are evidently passing through this country to-day, that inasmuch as certain nations are "fighting our battles" therefore we will pay their bills, which I understand not to be the idea of Congress?

Mr. RAINEY. That certainly is not the sentiment of the Congress.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Has it not been customary, and is it not likely that custom will be followed in the issuance of bonds, to provide that the Government may at the end of a certain time call the bonds in for redemption, that saving the right, so far as the Government is concerned, and the time is fixed for the final payment of the bonds being fixed with the idea of strengthening the value of the bonds in the market?

Mr. RAINEY. That is frequently done, and that is a very correct enonomic theory, and that may be put into force by the Secretary of the Treasury, if it appears to be desirable. The terms are so completely left to his discretion that he can follow the practice sometimes adopted, as suggested by my colleague from Illinois, if it appears to be desirable.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not the discretion so broad that if foreign nations should appeal to the President of the United States not to call these bonds that he may exercise his discretion and not call them. Is not that the fact?

Mr. RAINEY. The idea is to give the Secretary the very widest discretion; that is the purpose of this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the House, I will ask that my amendment may be amended so that it shall read 50 years instead of 30 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by striking out 30 and inserting 50. Is there objection?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I simply desire to say that I think it is as objectionable as 30; that any limitation is objectionable. The Secretary may limit some of these bonds as indicated by the pending amendment, others he may not so limit.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman realizes that some of the bonds issued under this act, or provided for under this act—for instance, the Panama bonds—are 50-year bonds?

Mr. RAINEY. I so understand, and have so stated.

Mr. LONGWORTH. So it would make them all uniform if the gentleman's amendment should be adopted.

Mr. RAINEY. It would make them all mature in 50 years or less, and that is what I would avoid.

The CHAIRMAN. The immediate question is, Is there objection to the modification of the amendment by the gentleman from Pennsylvania? Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the House of Representatives is engaged in a most unusual proceeding. While I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that we should act early, I think it more important that we should act wisely than that we should act hastily. Discussion upon this unusual and most important matter is not a waste of time. We are finding out what we ourselves think. We are dealing with matters that are entirely new, new to the country and new to governmental action. We are proposing a thing that has never yet been done to the extent proposed. The loan by the Government of $3,000,000,000 to other governments introduces a new function of governmental action on our part. But we are at war; our allies are in the field with men. They need money; we can supply it. Our men are not trained for the trenches; we must furnish the money.

There are two matters before the House. The first is the raising of money by the Government of the United States from the people of the United States; and, second, to be loaned to other Governments. The manner of securing the money, the time the bonds shall run, the interest they shall bear is one proposition. What shall be done with the money by the borrowers, the manner of its loan, the duration of the loan to the Governments that borrow it is quite another question. It is important in the consideration of the time these bonds shall run that posterity should be taken into account, that the ability of the Government of the United States to pay within the next 5 years, within the next 10 years, should be taken into account, and the debt paid at the earliest day possible; and if we can resort to taxes within this year, within the next, to pay a large portion of the money we are raising to loan to friendly nations engaged in the war with us upon a common foe, we should resort to those measures of taxation for the purpose of raising that money and raise it now and save future generations from paying the burden of debt that we are creating to-day. We should pay as we go as far as possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas that he may continue for five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, this money that is loaned to our allies may be paid back to us and it may not. We can not decide that matter here to-day. That will be settled around the table of the conquerors at the close of the war. If we are sitting with the conquerors in this war—and we will be—we can discuss whether or not we are to receive a return of the money that is advanced to the nations fighting the same foe we are. If we sit with the vanquished—and we will not—we will have an opportunity to discuss the matter there as to whether or not we are to have a return of the money that is proposed to be raised to-day. So that we waste time when we talk now about whether or not or when this money shall be returned to the Government of the United States. Now, as to the question of the length of time these bonds shall run. In the exercise of wise discretion the Executive should exercise that discretion by placing the bonds on the market at the lowest rate of interest at which they can sell and for the shortest length of time that is compatible with a good sale. We should extinguish the debt at the earliest day possible. Now, Mr. Chairman, fearing I may not have an opportunity when other sections are reached providing for interest, I want to make this observation: If I could do so, I would amend the bill providing that there shall be a flat rate of interest of 3½ per cent without provision for a possible increase in the rate. When Grant was sent to a horse dealer to buy a horse he was told by his father to say that he would give $100 for the horse, and if he could not get it for that to offer $125.

Of course, he paid $125 for the horse. By providing in this bill a possible increase in the interest rate we invite the bond market as to call for the higher rate of interest the bonds are finally to pay. I would leave the flat rate of interest at 3½ per cent in the bill. Then if in three months or six months it becomes necessary to issue bonds at a higher rate of interest the Congress can provide then for the necessity that may arise rather than to provide for it now.

So in the interest of the people of the future these bonds should run for the shortest time possible, and that they shall bear a rate of interest of 3½ per cent without any promise of an increased rate on a reissue under a future contingency. If that future contingency shall arise, then will be sufficient time to provide for an increased rate of interest.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. MONTAGUE and Mr. HARDY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] is recognized.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, perhaps many sentiments and convictions entertained in maturer years arise from some striking saying or aphorism heard in youth. One now comes vividly to my mind, as I recall Washington's reported rebuke to the Continental Congress that a "war can not be conducted by a debating society." This sagacious criticism was intended to direct the attention of the Congress to the difference between its business and the business of the Executive, between the domain of legislation and the domain of administration, thus compelling acceptance of the obvious truth that war and its cognate functions can not be successfully administered by the legislative branch of the Government or by a committee of that branch.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, with the implications and conclusions suggested by this wise advice, I am loath at this time to interfere by my vote or by my counsel with details relating to the form and issue of the bonds provided for in this bill. I believe such amendments are an inexpedient and unwise interference with administrative details that should be left to the executive department during the exigencies of this war.

Mr. Chairman, I also believe that in the procedure of legislation, as distinguished from the matter of legislation itself, two essentials should be kept clearly in mind—expedition and unanimity; that we should act with all practicable speed, and that our actions should as far as possible be supported by unanimous votes. When the conclusion is inevitable, when the result is most certain, it is under existing conditions most salutary that we subordinate as far as possible our personal judgments and opinions to secure a record of unanimity, in order that America's action may present to our enemy an undented line, a united and determined people. [Applause.]

I must confess, Mr. Chairman, to a weakness—if gratitude can be a weakness—certainly to a hope, that there would be in this bill some clearer recognition of our immeasurable debt to the people of France. [Applause.] I believe that for once at least in the life of our Nation our gratitude for a long-past act of transcendent generosity and our immediate national policy and self-interest not only find no conflict but an inspiring and elevating consonance. I had hoped that the nourishing succor that came to us in the hour of our weakness would now find explicit recognition in the hour of our strength. I had hoped that this Congress would be unanimous in giving definite and articulate recognition to those noble sentiments of gratitude that swell the hearts of the American people in this solemn hour. I beg to remind the Members that the existence of our free institutions, the very right to sit here, to confer and deliberate as we are now doing, upon the duty of our great Republic, were made possible, aye, were vouchsafed to us by the fraternal and heroic assistance and cooperation of the French Nation. [Applause.] The world to-day beholds the agony and glory of France; civilization itself is moved by her heroic resistance to the colossal forces now battling to extinguish her republican institutions and tear asunder the very fabric of her liberties. So I had hoped that to-day our great Nation, this puissant people, might through their Representatives in this Hall, at least write into this bill a forbearance and remittance of the interest upon any French bond purchased by the American Government. To do more would be becoming; to do less is ignoble. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, has our Republic forgotten its weakness, its dire extremities, in the days of its infancy? Let the words of Washington recall them. Writing to his beloved friend George Mason, on October 22, 1780, just a year before the surrender of Cornwallis, he said:

> We are without money, and have been so for a great length of time; without provision and forage, except what is taken by impress; without clothing; and shortly shall be (in a manner) without men. In a word, we have lived upon expedients till we can live no longer.

Writing to Sullivan, a Member of the Continental Congress, on November 20, 1780, he said:

> I will take the liberty in this place to give it as my opinion that a foreign loan is indispensably necessary to the continuance of the war. Congress will deceive themselves if they imagine that the Army or a State that is the theater of war can run through a second campaign as the last.

Again, to John Laurens, who had just been sent abroad as an agent to beg a loan from France, Washington wrote on April 9, 1781:

> If France delays a timely and powerful aid in the critical posture of our affairs, it will avail us nothing should she attempt it hereafter. We are at this hour suspended in the balance. * * * We can not transport the provisions from the States in which they are assessed to the Army, because we can not pay the teamsters who will no longer work for certificates. Our troops are approaching fast to nakedness and we have nothing to clothe them with. Our hospitals are without medicine and our sick without meat, except such as well men eat. All our public works are at a stand and the artificers disbanding. In a word, we are at the end of our tether, and now or never our deliverance must come.

These words were ringing in the ears of Benjamin Franklin, of Silas Dean, and of John Laurens when endeavoring to reach the hearts and the treasury of the French nation. How did that nation respond? The historic record answers to her glory and to our deliverance.

On January 16, 1797, Timothy Pickering, Secretary of State, in a note to Pinckney, our minister in France, declared that the French nation during these days of our extremity loaned and gave to us about 53,000,000 livres; and Bancroft Davis, in his very able compilation of Senate Document No. 47, Fort-eighth Congress, second session, with his accustomed industry and accuracy of research, quotes with approval the figures just given, the purchasing value of which to-day would equal $50,000,000. France remitted the interest on her loans to us until the final signing of treaty of peace with Great Britain, and, moreover, she gave us outright 9,000,000 livres. But, Mr. Chairman, this gift and these loans, generous as they were, coming from a nation of 25,000,000 people, are insignificant when compared with the real contribution of France to our birth and life as a nation. In those fateful years France came to our assistance with an army and a navy that assured our independence; that assured the existence of free, democratic institutions on this hemisphere. A consequential right is the precious privilege of the Representatives of the people to sit in this Hall at this hour to discuss the right and duty of our now mighty Republic to associate herself with the democracies of the world in their efforts to save and perpetuate right and justice and liberty in the earth. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the figures of France's land and naval forces sent to our rescue are never cold. I give them as found in Senate Document No. 77, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session.

The above is exclusive of the "garrisons" of infantry on the vessels of the fleet, taking the place of marines of the present day, there being from 100 to 150 men on each of the larger vessels, nor does it take into account drafts sent to repair casualties. The most accurate totals I have been able to obtain place the total military, naval, and transport service of France sent to aid us in the Revolutionary War at 47,989 men and 99 vessels of war and transports.

At the siege of Yorktown, which lasted 19 days, there were 5,500 American and 7,000 French troops of the line, exclusive of 3,500 militia under the command of Gen. Nelson and 36 French ships of war under De Grasse. The strategy, courage, and effectiveness of commanders and men are attested by the victory at that small town, now peacefully overlooking the great river and adjoining bay.

Mr. Chairman, Benjamin Franklin declared that without Yorktown our independence would have been set back a thousand years. This, of course, is an exaggeration, and was so intended by that great sage and patriot, in order to impress that mighty event upon subsequent generations. The American people understood the magnitude of the event, and when the Congress met after that great victory almost its first action, taken on October 29, 1781, was to provide that a monument be erected at Yorktown "adorned with emblems of the alliance" between the United States and the French nation to commemorate alike the achievements of America and France, and bearing "a succinct narrative of the surrender" of Cornwallis to Washington, the Commander in Chief of the combined forces of America and France, and to Rochambeau, commanding the French troops, and to De Grasse, commanding "the naval army of France." [Applause.] In pursuance of this resolution the Government has erected a marble monument, a classic column, overlooking the great river and bay, and casting its shadow from day to day over the soil upon which the troops of Cornwallis fought and surrendered, over the land upon which the allied armies and the majestic Washington and his great companion in arms, the young, the romantic, the incomparable Lafayette, beheld the victorious culmination of their arduous and heroic labors, and over the waters upon which rode the gallant fleet of the French nation.

Mr. Chairman, it has been variously estimated that these naval and military expeditions cost the French nation between $350,000,000 and $732,000,000. France at that time was quite unequal to so enormous an expenditure. The explicit understanding between France and America was that our Nation was to have the full benefit of the results of victory, whether in the form of booty or territory; that it should all inure to the United States. We have never undertaken to repay this great debt, and I had hoped in connection with the issue of the bonds provided for in this bill that there would be some express recognition, fixed and definite, of the gratitude of this Republic to her fair and afflicted friend across the sea for our deliverance in the years long gone by. [Applause.]

France has never asked us to repay this debt, and we have never contemplated so doing; for a debt of this character can not be paid save by meeting in like manner an event of like character in the life of France itself. Gentlemen of the committee, we can not measure assistance of this sort by money standards. Is it possible to value in coin the independence of the American Nation? Is it possible to measure in coin the immeasurable consequences that have thus far come or the consequences and the growth and the power and the glory that shall yet come to the American Nation? [Applause.]

I know it has been said, Mr. Chairman, that we should not as a Nation discriminate in our aid to the allied nations. I have heard it said in private upon the floor that we have no right "to make fish of one and fowl of another." May I remind the House that we had no qualms about a distinction of this character 140 years ago? We were then very ready and very willing to accept the French pullet picked, plucked, stuffed, cooked, and served! [Applause.]

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has just intimated that there should be no discrimination as respects the allied nations. I myself would subscribe, as a general principle, to that statement; but I can never subscribe to a view that would prevent this Nation from making discrimination in behalf of a nation that made the existence of this Republic possible. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. With pleasure.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not intimate that there should not be any discrimination. I said, in discussing what we are doing at this time, that the primary purpose and chief thing is the interest of the United States, which should not be subordinated to the interest of or sympathy with any other nation. My sympathies are such that I would very gladly do something for France that I would not do for some of our other friends at this time. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think I misunderstood the gentleman, and his reaffirmation of his position constrains me to assert that if France 140 years ago had taken the ground the distinguished gentleman from New York now takes we would never have had her assistance in our great Revolution. [Applause.] France at that time also had an ally, Spain, and we did not reject the French discriminations in our favor.

Mr. Chairman, I will not minimize the assistance of France by a consideration of any particular inducements she may have had to intervene in our behalf. I know that some attribute her intervention to her hostility to England, but I think a fair and judicial assessment of all the surrounding circumstances will negative such a motive. Bancroft, the eminent historian, gives in my opinion the fairest statement of the causes and motives. He says:

> Many causes combined to produce the alliance of France and the American Republic, but the forces which brought all influences harmoniously together, overruling the timorous levity of Maurepas and the dull reluctance of Louis XVI, was the movement of intellectual freedom.

Which is but another form of expression of the propulsive power of democracy or expanding political freedom.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proced for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia may have an additional five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I appreciate the courtesy of the House.

Mr. Chairman, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] we have in our country what the allied nations do not have. They have soldiers, but meager supplies; we have supplies but few soldiers. We have many men—fine men—but as yet untrained; they are not soldiers. It will take a year or two years to secure, train, equip, and transport an American army to France. In the meantime France and the allied powers need commodities and supplies of various kinds and quantities. We must employ our credit for this purpose, and we must employ it at once; and to this end I believe that the sale of our bonds would be greatly facilitated if the purchasing public concretely realized that in purchasing many of these bonds our gratitude to France would be expressed and her immediate effective military power immensely strengthened against our common enemy. These have been the motives actuating me, motives that approved a union of gratitude and self-interest, of lofty sentiment and national selfishness.

But, Mr. Chairman, we should help the allies according to their necessities, and as those necessities are disclosed to us by themselves. Money and credits, therefore, should be immediately extended or expended in order that these supplies and commodities may be purchased and assembled. But first and of supreme moment, Mr. Chairman, is the necessity of transportation, otherwise our credits are vainly extended and our commodities and supplies will rust and rot upon our soil. So our immediate genius and energies should be devoted to over-seas transportation, for thereby our enemy will be struck the hardest and most vital blow; and, in the meantime, Mr. Chairman, we can bend our wisdom and energies to an expeditionary army, which will bear our flag in cooperation with the flags of those nations so valiantly fighting for free institutions. The moral effect of such a force, excluding its actual, practical compelling power, will give us a more comfortable seat at the table upon which is to be written the terms of final peace, and at which table America, of all nations, should have a seat and a pen if it is to be a peace of justice and of long duration.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I beg again to suggest that it is not my purpose or wish to embarrass any program. I am willing, if reluctant to sacrifice any personal opinion I may have as to the expediency of omitting a more direct expression of America's gratitude to France, hoping that at some future day, when the war is well over and the accounting of things is had, that the administrative department of our Government having in charge our foreign affairs may write into some convention or treaty, as was done by France in 1782, an ample and definite expression of the abiding gratitude of the American people for the transcendent generosity of France. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. COMSTOCK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if this were an oratorical contest, I should decline to follow the eloquent gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], who has illustrated in his speech that oratory is not a lost art. I had hoped, in common, I presume, with every other Member of this House, that the war would be averted. That hope has fled. It is idle now longer to dwell upon the blessings of peace or the horrors of war. It remains only for this Congress to make ample provision for the war in which it is about to embark, and to-day that is the highest duty that devolves upon this body.

It is not given even to the wisest to forecast the cost in money or in men of conducting a war so stupendous as that with which we are now confronted. Necessarily the estimate must be made primarily by a limited number of Members of this House. That estimate has been made by our committee, whom we have every reason to believe to be conscientious and studious, after they have devoted to the question the very best and highest consideration which they could bestow. We may not know all the facts that were before that committee. We are assured, however, that in view of the conditions which confronted them and the solemn duty imposed upon them, they did not shrink from the obligation to give fair, thorough, and conscientious consideration to all the questions which it was necessary for them to consider in order to arrive at a fair conclusion. With the result reached by that committee, with the exception of certain amendments proposed and to which no serious objection is urged, I am content.

I accept the result of their judgment and the bill as an expression of their conscientious views and opinions after having considered all the facts within their reach. So, therefore, I shall vote for the measure, believing it is the best that will be offered, and I have confidence not only in the extraordinary attainments of our Chief Executive but in the learning, judgment, and patriotism of those who are to cooperate with him in the management of the vast fund which will be devoted to carrying on this war and to their wisdom and good conscience in dispensing that fund. [Applause.] It is up to them, and not to us. It is a duty which must be delegated to some one. I delegate it freely and with confidence to the Chief Executive and those associated with him in dispensing this fund. [Applause.] I take it that, being a loan, it implies repayment. As to the details of the loan and the disposition of this money, they are matters for others better equipped and better qualified to judge than I pretend to be.

In this connection I trust that, without imposing upon the House, I may be permitted to state that upon the war resolution

I voted in favor of it. I also voted for an amendment to limit the transporting of conscripted American troops to Europe to fight there. I believed then, as I believe now, that that amendment ought to have been agreed to. It was not. I accept the opinion and judgment of the majority. The opposition to that amendment was based upon the belief that the transporting of troops to reenforce the armies abroad would shorten the war and lessen human sorrow and misery. I do not believe that the transporting of our troops to reinforce the British and French troops would necessarily shorten the war. I do not believe that it would lessen the toll of human life. It would increase the ferocity of the conflict. It would not only add to the ferocity of the strife, but it would make the fortunes of the vanquished harder after the battle was done. The proposed amendment was not intended in any way to interfere with voluntary service on the part of those who wish to go abroad and take part in that war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DIXON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the time of his colleague [Mr. COMSTOCK] be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COMSTOCK. I thank the gentleman and the House for the courtesy, but I will not occupy five mintues longer. If I could control matters, I would wage war to the fullest extent upon the ocean. I would clear the seas and oceans of mines and submarines. I would right the outrageous wrongs of which we rightfully complain, where they were committed upon the common highways of the world, but I would not send American soldiers against their will into the shambles of Europe. [Applause.] We have there no firesides to defend. Our household gods are here. The altars at which we worship are here, and here are our homes, which every true American would defend against the world. If there is any disposition upon the part of Americans—and there doubtless is—to take part actively and in person in the contest abroad, there are wide-open ways to all who are so inclined to go abroad and fight. There is, as there has long been connected with the military forces of France, a body of men known as the Foreign Legion, in existence perhaps for nearly a hundred years; a military body composed of earls and dukes and counts and barons, of adventurers, exconvicts, lawless men, here and there a plain gentleman. They are all there. They are men who assume the grim hazards of glory or the grave, and fight with reckless valor.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. COMSTOCK. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to say to the gentleman that he is blackening the name of one of the most famous fighting organizations of the world. The Foreign Legion of France is not composed of the character of men the gentleman has stated. [Applause.]

Mr. COMSTOCK. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I think history will bear me out, that that body of men is made up of men without distinction of race, color, rank, or heritage, every type of man. They are soldiers of fortune.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; but they are not made up of assassins and cowards, and the character of men that the gentleman stated.

Mr. COMSTOCK. I do not mean to do any violence or wrong to the Foreign Legion of which I speak. The general character of that command has been known and recognized, I think, for almost a century. They are largely made up of soldiers of fortune. They fight for honor, they fight to gratify ambition, they fight from love of fighting, and some of them from the baser motive of revenge, but they are famous fighting men. [Applause.]

It is suggested to me by the address of the gentleman from Massachusetts last evening that two of our most distinguished citizens have tendered their services to the Government. This is exemplary. One has offered himself as an enlisted man. Both have rendered military service and honorably bore the same rank. Each is devoted to his country and each is of undoubted courage. If these eminent and patriotic citizens, under the impulse of duty, should find themselves shoulder to shoulder, attacking the now wavering line of Von Hindenburg, it would be a sight to make Democrats, Republicans, Progressives, Socialists, and Prohibitionists weep with pride and joy. I do not expect to see that sight. But if they do go in any capacity, I hope they will return crowned with laurels and bearing in their arms the roses of England and the lilies of France.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, at this time of crisis probably no citizen of the Republic is rendering more distinguished service than Samuel Gompers, the president of the American Federation of Labor. In this morning's mail I received a letter from Mr. Gompers, accompanied by a communication from Mr. George B. Hoit, of Illinois, and Mr. Gompers requests that these communications be read to this House. On account of the distinguished position occupied by Mr. Gompers, I will ask the indulgence of the House to have this letter read in my time. It may take more than five minutes, perhaps seven or eight. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for a sufficient length of time to have read the communication to which he refers. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., April 13, 1917.

Hon. EDWARD KEATING,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KEATING: To-day at a conference of representatives of the American Federation of Labor we had under advisement a number of matters affecting the vital interests of our country, as well as those of our fellow workers, and during that conference we discussed the subject of the bill H. R. 2762, reported by the Committee on Ways and Means, it being "A bill to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and to extend credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes."

It was our opinion and I was directed to respectfully submit that there are other available means to supply the financial needs of the Government to carry on and meet the expenses of the present war other than is proposed in the $5,000,000,000 bond issue, and that the distant future should not be mortgaged while other available means are at the command of our Government.

The following suggestions are respectfully submitted:

1. The Postal Savings Bank System should be at once made the avenue for the deposit by the people of the United States of immense sums of money.

2. The limitation of the deposits to $1,000 per person should be suspended for a specified period or, if necessary, for the duration of the war.

3. The rate of interest on postal savings bank deposits should be increased from 2 per cent to 3 per cent per annum.

4. The income tax should be substantially increased and graduated.

5. The inheritance tax should be materially increased, and these two latter suggestions should be made to bear the large proportion of the financial needs of the Government.

6. A tax on land values should be laid, not only as a war emergency measure, but also for a permanent means of raising revenue.

It is not our purpose to burden the suggestions with arguments or extensive explanations to those who have given the subjects studious thought. They are obvious and effective.

In addition to the above, I beg to accompany this with a letter which I recently received from Mr. George B. Hoit, of Geneseo, Ill. It is suggested that the above and the accompanying letter should be brought to the attention of the Members of the House of Representatives and published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

It should not be necessary to give the assurance that it is the aim and purpose of the men and women in the American labor movement to do their full duty in the present crisis and to give the service so essential to safeguard the principles and ideals of freedom for which the Republic of the United States stands.

With assurances of high regard, and thanking you in advance for what you may do in the matter, I have the honor to remain,

Yours, respectfully,

SAMUEL GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

HOIT'S BANKERS' AGENCY,
Geneseo, Ill., March 7, 1917.

Hon. SAMUEL GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GOMPERS: In 1907, when I wrote a plan for a system of United States banks, in connection with the postal savings banks, which were not then in existence, but for which I worked steadily with my friend, Senator Carter, from Montana, I advocated the paying of 3 per cent interest by the postal savings bank, but we found this would meet with such opposition from existing banks that it would be impossible to carry.

At the beginning of the war, France and England had restrictions as to the amount any individual, or firm, might deposit in their postal savings banks. This restriction being promptly removed when the war started, and now, at this opportune time, when there is every reason in the world that we should remove all restrictions as to amounts that may be deposited, and that we profit by the mistakes of others, increase the rate of interest from 2 to 3 per cent, thereby accomplishing more in the way of preparedness for whatever may come, in my opinion, than by any single act of Congress. And this is of the greatest interest to you and the vast body of workingmen, especially men uneducated, who have no means of knowing whether the bank in which they place their savings is solvent or not; and to you or me it would be a relief at all times, especially times like 1893 and 1907, when the Government postal savings banks, supported by the Federal reserve banks, would at all times pay in cash to us the amount that we had deposited with them.

Again, if the postal savings banks pay 3 per cent, this Government, in any time of direst need and greatest stress for currency, would never be obliged to pay an amount in excess of 3 per cent upon their loans, however large they might be; never being in the humiliating position of foreign countries to-day paying 5 and over, plus unheard-of rates of brokerage, as Russia has.

Think of it, dear Mr. Gompers, the banks to-day, complaining because of the large amount of deposits, which many say on account of interest paid they are carrying at a loss, are in no position to object at a time when they would be affected the least, and when the deposits could be so used by our Government that none in authority need give a thought to the entire subscription of any and every bond issue. And the people whom you represent would feel that at last the Government had done something distinctively for their benefit.

I wish I had the power to go before the proper committee having authority to act, and I wish I knew the right Senators and Representatives at this time to present this matter, as you can readily see that opposition would develop if widely disclosed before action was taken. Not opposition on account of it being wrong, but opposition on account of selfish interests.

You can readily see there is nothing to be gained financially by any individual in championing this change, but that it will work a great good for the vast majority of the American people, and be of inestimable benefit to the Government itself.

And with your long experience and unlimited acquaintance I believe you will know the proper officials to whom this should be presented.

With the only thought of benefiting our Government and our people in writing this letter to you, I feel sure you will pardon me for trespassing upon your time, and, assuring you of my kindest personal regards, I am,

Sincerely, yours, GEO. B. HOIT,
Geneseo, Ill.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment to this extent. There should be a limitation of the time these bonds should run—not to hamper the Secretary of the Treasury, but probably to defend him. He will have $3,000,000,000 to loan. There will be a demand of five dollars for every one dollar that he will have to loan. The importunities of the nations of Europe now involved will be enough to try the strength and fiber of the Secretary of the Treasury now, or whoever his successor may be during the years the loaning may continue. So that when, as a matter of fact, there is an attempt to limit the time for which the bonds shall run, it is to defend and not to hamper him.

But there is a phase of this matter which has not been discussed. My view of this transaction is that it is purely business. I appreciate the noble sentiments uttered by the gentleman from Virginia, Gov. MONTAGUE, in desiring at this time making a gift to France, if you please, of a large sum of money for immediate use. But we are at the beginning of an undertaking when national sentiment should give way to national business. When this war will have closed, then it will be time enough for us to consider by way of sentiment what we see fit to give France or any of our other friends. The sole proposition now is dollars and cents of value to those Governments as effective war means.

There are two propositions, only one of which has been considered. That is, How will the bonds we issue sell? Will they sell at par if drawn at 10 or 20 or 50 years? The other and, to my mind, more important phase has not been even referred to. These two phases are, How much will our bonds sell for? and, second, What is going to be the value of the securities we take? So far as I am concerned, I would rather have a bond running 50 years issued by this Government than a bond running 10, 20, or 30 years. But, on quite the contrary, I would rather have a bond running ten years issued by any foreign Government on earth than one running 50 years.

This is a new proposition of one nation taking the bonds of another, with no power on earth to collect them except at the cannon's mouth or through the good will of the obligating nation. The nation would issue bonds to us for 10, 15, or 20 years. If it were successful in the war and survived and was strong in that generation, every man, woman, and child would remember the assistance the American Government gave to them in their time of need. But let another generation rise, a generation when they will "know not Joseph," will know nothing of him only as a matter of history, and with the mutations of time and the friction between nations, and especially our Nation holding and the other owing obligations, it will become a very serious question whether or not these securities will be worth par, worth a little or nothing at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] asked me a question which I did not have time to answer fully, as to the salability of the bonds if a term of limitation was fixed. I ask the gentleman from Nebraska whether he believes that if the term is left indeterminate it will not be more difficult to sell the bonds?

Mr. SLOAN. I think every fact that the Congress can give to the world limiting or controlling the bonds will strengthen the bonds when issued. Too much latitude permitted or executed by the administrative authority, either allowed or exercised, tends to weaken the bonds. Now I have an amendment to be presented, if the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] be voted down, providing that the bonds which we issue, and necessarily under the terms of the bill the bonds we take, shall each run for a period of 20 years, so that we will be sure of a fair market value of our own bonds insuring a large return upon their sale; and upon the other hand, a fair and almost certain value of the bonds we take from other nations. Gentlemen must consider that this is absolutely new departure so far as the United States is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLOAN. I say it is purely a new proposition, so far as this Nation is concerned, the financing of any other great nation. When we take into account the large amount involved—$3,000,000,000—it is not improbable that if there is a loan made to any of these nations that there will be a billion dollars loaned to one of them. If a billion dollars is loaned to any nation and that nation holds that billion dollars, and we hold in our war chest a billion dollars of its obligations, that nation may endure 20 years and probably would; that nation may have revolutions, two or three of them, in the first 50 years. The repudiation of that debt would almost be worth a revolution in some nations. It is a temptation to a nation that might lead them to seek a change of a former government if for no other purpose than to get rid of a billion dollars of national debt.

I do not charge that any of the great nations to whom we would loan at this time would do that. But these loans are not confined to great nations. There is that practical situation that must be considered by us in taking the securities. We should look not alone to the proposition that we obtain a large amount of money from the Americans who buy our bonds, but that we shall obtain security which will be fairly of equal value. So far as I am concerned, I would rather have an efficient bond issue by any foreign nation on earth paid in 10 years than one running 50 years for the same amount.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Has the gentleman in mind any great nation of the earth that has ever repudiated a debt as a result of a change in the form of government?

Mr. SLOAN. I think there are none coming under the classification in the gentleman's thought, but I am not prepared to answer the question catagorically now. I have not any in mind just now, but this is a new proposition, it is an absolutely new field. While other nations, I understand, under certain circumstances have loaned money to neighbor nations, it has never been loaned on any such colossal scale that we propose to make in this loan now. In consideration of this matter I only ask, not that I expect that this bill be changed—though I think it ought to be changed—that men resolve this proposition into its two important elements, first, the amount of money that we can obtain for our loan, and, second, the value of the security which we expect to take. From both standpoints a limitation of term would be wise. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, unless this bill is amended as suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], I shall feel constrained to follow his course when it comes to the final vote. Early in the discussion of this bill it was pointed out to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee yesterday morning that the first section of this bill distinctly provides for the disposition of the bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury as a popular loan, to be sold at not less than par. This means that bonds will be issued in small denominations, in order to give all an equal opportunity to subscribe for one or more shares. It is my understanding that the department will use the post offices and other popular mediums for the sale of these bonds and facilitate in every way their purchase by citizens who have no account with stock brokers and who are not in the custom of daily dealing with bankers or dickering on the stock market. The section then provides—I am now reading from line 16 to the end of section 1:

And any portion of the bond so offered and not subscribed for may be otherwise disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury, but no commission shall be allowed, etc.

Gentlemen, I am afraid of that word "otherwise." With all due deference to the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], I think it is quite fortunate that the lawyers of this House have taken such an active interest in the wording of this bill. I do not want to quibble on words any more than the gentleman from Michigan, but my legal training warns me, and in my way of thinking there is but one interpretation to this section, namely, that the Secretary of the Treasury, after disposing of as many of these bonds by popular subscription at par, may dispose of the balance at less than par. What will be the result? Money lenders will not buy as long as they are at par; investors will wait until they go down; and the patriotic citizen who subscribes solely for patriotic motives—and there will be hundreds of thousands of them—will be taxed an amount equal to the difference between the par value of the bond and the subsequent market value for their patriotism and loyalty, while speculators and financial slackers will abide the time and reap a profit. I was glad to hear that the committee intends to rigidly hold these bonds at par. That being so, I trust that the committee will so amend their bill as to make it unequivocal, clear, and certain. If there is to be unanimity on this bill, let there be such plain and distinct language employed as to leave the bill capable of but one interpretation and expressing the true intent of this House.

I concur in the belief expressed that section 2 should be so amended as to limit the loans to nations now at war with the Imperial Government of Germany. This, in my mind, is an important and necessary change, and one, I should believe, which would be welcomed by the President and his Secretary of the Treasury, intrusted with the responsible duty of making this loan in such manner as to bring about the desired result in the quickest time possible.

When I first read section 7 of this bill and figured that the percentage allowed to the Secretary of the Treasury for expenses in connection with this loan amounted to $12,000,000 I was somewhat appalled. Of course I had confidence in the gentlemen of the committee, and knew that they had carefully examined this item, and so was somewhat chary of commenting on it. After the remarks, however, of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], whose opinion on fiscal matters is authoritative, I venture the statement that I, too, consider the allowance exaggerated. Appreciating the enormous cost of printing, the increased cost of stock and labor, the magnitude of the issue, I believe that with the staff and personnel of the Treasury Department, with the exercise of proper economy, the allowance could be safely cut in half. And I consider, although our minds may be somewhat bewildered after these lengthy discussions in billions, that a saving of $6,000,000 in these critical times is indeed a pretty penny to save.

While this bond issue, unprecedented in its size, may startle the country at first blush, after careful consideration I am sure the people will realize that little less could be offered. Direct taxation is the popular cry of the moment. It soon will be understood that immediately available funds could not be obtained by such means. Ultimately, and commencing very soon, this indebtedness will be paid by taxation—direct, indirect, on incomes, excess profits. No one, I am sure, will have occasion to feel offended that he has been omitted in the general list which will soon be brought before us. I am certain that the taxes will be equally apportioned and that all will be made to bear their just proportionate share of this burden. Present conditions indicate that there is every disposition to bear them cheerfully. The tax dodger will have a sorry time.

I do not share the belief of some of my colleagues who have expressed firm confidence and figure on the complete restitution of the $3,000,000,000 loan to be made to foreign Governments. Yes; I believe that a good portion will be in due time returned, but I am certain that some of it will have to be placed on the profit and loss column of Uncle Sam's books. Let us understand that clearly now and not be deceived later. Even so, if this brings about a speedy termination of the European war and permanent peace to our own country it is a good investment at that.

Rich in natural, industrial, and commercial resources; patriotic, now that we are in war, to a man; eager and willing to sustain our burden and do our share, we must provide the means to do our duty and carry out our mission in proportion to the wealth of our natural resources and the extent of our national responsibility.

With the changes suggested, I shall vote for this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I doubt whether I ought to again obtrude myself upon the House. We are about to authorize the borrowing of $8,000,000,000—very close to $8,000,000,000 I think it totals—of which close to $6,000,000,000 will be in the form of bonds. There may be gentlemen in the House who know a good deal about the issuance of bonds to be subscribed by the public, but it is very certain there is no one in the House who knows very much about the issuance of five or six billion dollars of bonds to be subscribed by the public. The total amount of the indebtedness we authorized is, I believe, about equal to or more than half the amount of deposits in all of the national banks of the country combined. Those who imagine that it will be an easy matter to float five or six billion dollars of bonds may have another guess coming. Even if they be subscribed for, the payment of them will be a matter of great and grave difficulty without unsettling the rest of the credits in the country. If I were in control of the issuance of these bonds, the first thing that I would want to do would be to call in and obtain the advice of men who have been engaged in that business, and, although I have not any particular love for some of the great financiers of the country, I think one of the men whose advice I would ask would be Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, and also the National City Bank group and other men engaged in the floating of bonds by municipal corporations, railroad corporations, public-utility corporations, and people who are engaged in the selling of bonds throughout the country, in order to obtain advice as to the terms upon which these bonds are most likely to be subscribed for.

I doubt whether Mr. McAdoo, the Secretary of the Treasury, knows enough without advice, or would pretend for a moment that he knows enough without advice, to determine the terms and conditions of the issuance of these bonds. This is not floating $300,000,000 of bonds, as we did at the time of the Spanish War. This is the floating of $5,000,000,000 of bonds, with the authority to float still more to take up bonds now outstanding. It might be that in the House, if we had a committee which had investigated the subject and had taken advice upon it, we would know enough to express our opinion. I doubt very much whether we do now, and, although I admire and applaud the efforts of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] in offering his amendment, in causing a discussion of the subject in the House, I can not agree with him that it is the duty of the House to determine the terms and conditions or the length of time that the bonds shall run, when it comes to determining the best terms upon which you are going to float the greatest indebtedness that this country ever saw, if not the greatest that the world has ever seen.

I hope the loan will be a success. I do not think anyone can tell in advance. The best length of time for which the bonds shall run, the best terms to be fixed, we must leave to the judgment of men who are able in their turn to obtain the best judgment of men who know the most that anyone can know upon the subject. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I agree substantially with what the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] stated earlier in the day, when he addressed the committee, and also with what my colleague [Mr. MANN] stated who followed him. I do not know that I can make any suggestions that will inform this committee. I think you have got to give the President, who is primarily responsible in this matter, some latitude. I do not know that I would curtail it; I am inclined to think that I would not. There are certain amendments that have been agreed to back and forth which I think are wise. I have not been in the House all of the time while consideration of this bill has been going on in committee. Other duties in connection with the business of the House have required my presence elsewhere.

I think this is a loan, not a gift. We are not in a giving business by the billions or the three billions of dollars. Does anyone suppose that we would have declared war against Germany if she had not blown up our ships without notice? The war was commenced by Germany upon the high seas against us. We properly declared war against Germany. That is as far as it has gone. Austria is an ally of Germany, Turkey is an ally of Germany, and also Bulgaria. We have not declared war against those countries, and whether we will or not remains to be seen later on; but the President so far, as I recollect, and I believe I am correct, has not even given passports to the diplomatic representatives of those countries. It is well enough to hark back 100 years and talk about what France did for us. I will tell you what she did for us during the war for our independence. She was in war with Great Britain and she made that loan to us, which we later repaid, and sent her navy and army here to some extent; and why? Because she thought she could hurt Great Britain more in that way than in any other. Of course there were individual exceptions. Lafayette was an exception, but individuals come and go.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Are not we at war with Germany now?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Can the gentleman distinguish between the two cases?

Mr. CANNON. Which?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Between our assisting France now while we are at war with Germany, and her assisting us when we were at war with England?

Mr. CANNON. I am not opposing this bill. Countries, nations, after all is said and done, in the aggregate protect themselves. [Applause.] We did not rush out, like the Irishman challenging somebody to tread on the tail of his coat, in search of a scrimmage, but the time came for us to declare war against Germany, and we declared war. Now, I recollect later on Great Britain and France were again at war during the Napoleonic wars. Our independence had been established. They both seized our ships and declared them good prizes. The French spoliation claims were paid, if I recollect aright, under a judgment of the Court of Claims that, while war was not declared by us against France, it was a state of war with France.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Permit me to say that many of the French spoliation claims have not been paid, although they have been pending, lo, these hundred of years.

Mr. CANNON. But whether they ought to have been paid or not, that is behind us, and finally when the decision of the Court of Claims came the legislation was enacted. Now, later on Great Britain and France were the people who opposed Russia in the Crimean War. The Dardanelles was at stake. You see nations act from time to time from what seems to be to their best interests.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. May I have about two minutes more?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, you know if we are going into the kindly feeling business I have perhaps a more kindly feeling for Russia than I have toward any other foreign country. Why, I speak now of something that is not barred by the statute of limitations. When the great struggle was on for the preservation of the Union and when foreign nations were threatening to interfere and acknowledge the Southern Confederacy, Russia at the critical moment landed her fleet in the New York and San Francisco Harbors and gave notice that she would have to be reckoned with. [Applause.] I feel pretty kindly toward Russia. I am not seeking now to go back into our Civil War—that is behind us, thank God! that is all settled—so I only refer to it as I hop, skip, and hardly jump in the five minutes yielded to me. [Laughter.] I believe this money that is to be loaned under the discretion of the President to the allies will be paid. Whether 3½ per cent will bring it or not I do not know.

I hope it will; yet you all recollect that there are $6,000,000,000, yes, seven or eight billion dollars—if you take the trust companies and insurance companies, possibly $9,000,000,000—that are on a 3½ and 4 per cent basis, and most of the deposits in the savings banks are, I am informed, on the 4 per cent basis. I hope the loan will be taken at 3½ per cent. Insurance money will not go into it, however, because insurance policies are issued on the basis of 3½ per cent. Yet the country is rich, and I hope and believe that 3½ per cent interest on the bonds, in the discretion of the President, will float the bonds. But let us not fool ourselves. Sentiment is all right; righteousness is all right; "follow the Master" is all right. If everybody followed the Master we would not be at war at all; but, unfortunately, everybody does not "follow the Master." [Applause.] Now, I think that is all I want to say.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As this paragraph now stands it is within the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe that those bonds may be issued for 999 years, which would be in the nature of a gift. The amendment now before the committee fixes a limitation to 50 years upon the life of the bonds.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; 50 years probably will be too long. I do not know whether it is or not. A 999-year bond would be more valuable, provided you have any assurance that for the 999 years the interest would be paid. The trouble is we may have future wars. I think it would be better, as we are trusting the administration with the negotiations, to let the time be fixed as the bill prescribes, because if you put "on or before" the bonds could be paid off in two, three, or four years. I would be glad to see them paid off; but "on or before" bonds are not as valuable in the markets of this country or the world as long-time bonds. There is not that option to pay them off at any time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would say to the gentleman the amendment gives that discretion to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman's amendment is "on or before."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not know that I can add anything that will enlighten the conscience and judgment of the men of this committee who are to vote upon this bill, yet I feel that I ought to say at least that which would define my position and view with reference to it, hoping that it may help some others. I voted for the resolution that recognized the existence of a state of war between my country and Germany. I now stand prepared to do everything in my power to uphold the arms of the executive departments of the Government and aid them in every way in carrying out the purpose and policy of that resolution.

We are in a state of war, and it is necessary for us, as so many men in this House have said, to work in harmony and in unity. Party lines are extinguished, and we are all Americans. "America first" is that motto which each one of us should follow.

I feel after carefully thinking over this bill that I am prepared to vote for it just as it was reported from the committee, with a few amendments that the committee itself is prepared to adopt. The declaration of the purpose regarding these great loans seems to me to be sufficiently expressed in the measure itself. I listened with great attention, as I always do, to the logical utterances of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] when he delivered his address on this floor yesterday, and it seemed to me as his reasoning was announced in words that he swept one along to the conclusion that he announced, and yet upon reflection I feel that, while logically and analytically his line of thought may be correct, yet as a substantial thing it is misleading. If three men are fighting out in the street with three other men and a great neutral man comes along and says, "I am going to declare war against you," naming one of the three, and he commences to pummel and beat that one man regardless of the other two, who are his allies and colleagues, tell me that you can draw fine lines of distinction and say the neutral is warring only against this one man and not against the others? With other allies on the other side of Germany fighting against us you can not draw these fine lines of distinction and say we will only give money to those who have declared war upon Germany and to none others. It does seem to me that there might be an occasion and a situation presented in which it would help to prosecute the war with greater efficiency if a loan could be made to a power which is engaged in the war, although without a declaration of war against Germany, for that one is helping to fight the common battle that we are fighting, and by helping to destroy an ally of our adversary is helping to destroy our adversary as well. [Applause.]

For that reason I would like to see this bill pass giving the largest power to the executive department of this Government, and giving it to them with full confidence that they will execute the great trust reposed in them with patriotic devotion to their duty. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Now, Mr. Chairman, we ought to be ready to vote upon this question. It has been thoroughly and fully discussed, and I am sure that every man in this Chamber has made up his mind as to what form his vote will take. But before concluding what I have to say I would like to call attention to what the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] advocated in such eloquent terms—our relations to France. I cordially agree with the thought, and wish it were practicable to put an amendment in this bill so that we might at this time, when the situation is so exactly analogous to what it was in the Revolutionary period, say to France, "We will make you a loan, the interest upon that loan shall be remitted, and that loan itself shall be payable at your pleasure."

True, France was fighting England in those days; but we are fighting Germany. True, she loaned us money without interest. She gave us men, she gave us the immortal La Fayette to help Washington in the dark hours of the American Revolution, and it would be but a small thing for us now to say, and show that the old remark is without truth, that "republics are ungrateful"; to show to the world that America with her higher ideals is prepared to set a new standard of action among the nations of the earth.

I am going to vote also with much regret against the amendment offered by my colleague from my own State. I do not believe that this is the place to put terms upon this loan or say in what fashion it shall be issued. I cordially concur in the remarks of the Republican leader [Mr. MANN] in all that he said upon that question, and in the unwisdom of attempting in the legislative halls to govern and regulate a purely financial matter that requires conference, advice, the best light that can be had, which must finally be shaped up according to the facts and circumstances as they will then appear for the making of this great loan, this great demand upon the American people. I believe in my heart of hearts this loan will be taken and fully subscribed by our people.

Americans will not be outdone by the loyal people of France, who have oversubscribed when called upon. And so the patriotic American will stand by his Government in this hour of crisis and render unto it loyal and patriotic service and devotion. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto shall close in 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, would that give us the opportunity to present an amendment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. SLOAN. I have an amendment I wish presented and voted upon. I do not wish to discuss it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Just present it.

Mr. SLOAN. I will just offer the amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. Just send it to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, what will be the economic effect in this country of the adoption of this bill? I want to try to give some sort of an answer to that very important question.

First, there are vast amounts of British, French, and Russian securities held here now. They range in value from 50 cents to about 90 cents on the dollar at this time. With this immense loan made to the entente the value of those securities will be greatly enhanced, so that some of the worthy gentlemen and patriots who have been so loudly clamoring for war will have some hundreds of millions of dollars of unearned profits transferred into their pockets.

Second, there will be a tremendous inflation of values; prices of all kinds will go to the skies—the price of labor less than all and last of all.

Third, we will exchange with these foreign nations our commodities for the three billions of their bonds that we are to take over and convert into money for them. We will send across the sea three billions of dollars' worth of the produce of American labor, chiefly of foodstuffs and the necessaries of life. The result will be that food will be taken out of the mouths of our own people; hunger will stand in the door of many humble homes in this land; and thousands of American men, women, and children will go barefooted and in rags.

I shall vote for this bond issue as a war measure and as a matter of stern necessity only, but I believe that we owe our first duty to our own people. As patriotic Americans we should have as our first concern the welfare of the people here at home. We should safeguard the supplies of foodstuffs and necessaries of life for the American people before we undertake to supply the demand abroad.

Some measures have got to be adopted. I have several ideas floating through my mind. I do not know what is the best, whether it be to fix the prices at which the necessaries of life are to be sold or to place an embargo upon the export of such necessaries. I do think, Mr. Chairman, that there should be a survey made of the supplies that are on hand in this country at this time. The absolute requirements of this Nation should be ascertained, and we should not export anything which may be required to keep up our own people. We should be sure to reserve for home use what may be necessary to clothe and feed our own folks to whom we owe our first duty and concern. [Applause.]

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I shall vote for this resolution just as the committee wants it to pass this House.

This country is now at war with Germany, or really we are at war with the Kaiser. We had no quarrel with the German people, but overt acts of the officials of Germany forced this country out of self-respect to declare war against a Government which did not respect the rules of civilized warfare. It makes no difference now how the Members of this House felt about the declaration of war. The fact is we are now at war. There is but one course for Congress to pursue, and that is the course that I shall pursue, and that is to follow our Commander in Chief, the President of the United States.

It is no time now to ask the reason why.

It is no time now to argue over the wording of resolutions.

It is no time now to suggest what some one else might have done.

It is no time now to ask what will our allies do with this money.

The only thing for us to do is to let the President conduct the war just as other nations let their rulers conduct their wars. It is no time for us to assert our individual rights and talk about the rights of Members and the privileges of Members and condemn those who criticize us.

If we do the right thing, we will not be criticized; and the right thing is to let the Executive of our Government conduct this war in the way that he deems is best for our country. No doubt the President understands many matters about our relations with the allies that it would not be proper to tell the whole world.

It is better that these movements were kept secret, and I am willing to let the President take care of that part of the conduct of this war, and I am willing to follow his lead. If we want to conduct a successful war, if we want this war brought to a speedy close, if we want this war conducted in the best way and for the best interests of our country, then there is but one policy to pursue, and this is to stand by the President of the United States, and he will steer our ship safely to the haven of victory. [Applause.]

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree entirely with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON]. We have declared that a state of war exists between our country and Germany. Shall we fail, shall we make no effort to bring this war to a speedy close, to crush our enemy, because, perchance, bonds in the hands of Morgan & Co. or other holders in this country may appreciate in value? Is it not our intention to crush Germany, to bring her to terms, if we raise and equip a large army? If we can bring about the same thing by the extension of credits and the use of money, why hesitate and allow the bugbear that somebody will profit out of the transaction to deter you? There is no way, there has been no way yet devised by man, to keep the infamous from grafting in times of such great crisis.

When it first dawned upon me that war between our country and Germany was inevitable and I cast about for a method by which we could render active and effective assistance to those European belligerents who were soon to become our allies in prosecuting the war against the common enemy, I was very much impressed with the proposition of loaning $1,000,000,000 to France without interest. Possibly I was moved to that more by sentiment than by a conception of real military strategy. I thought it would be a recognition of the great debt of gratitude that we owe to the French people who contributed to our cause in the Revolution men, money, arms, ammunition, and ships. Whether they did it with a selfish purpose or otherwise, they nevertheless aided our forefathers in bringing about the independence of the Nation.

I thought it would be a fitting tribute to that great French and American general whose life-size portrait adorns the wall of this Chamber at the left of the Speaker's chair, a companion portrait to that of the Father of our Country, the idol of every American schoolboy in the land—the Marquis de Lafayette. Congress long ago—I have not been advised just when—placed the portrait of that distinguished Frenchman side by side with that of George Washington.

But the bill before us proposes the loaning of $3,000,000,000 to our allies, or those of them who need financial support, and possibly it is the better part of wisdom to at this time propose no discriminations or seek to bestow special favors, and no doubt a considerable part of the $3,000,000,000 will be loaned to France.

I have no patience with those who think that we may, by making these loans, lose some money. I agree with what was said by the Representative from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] yesterday. We must take a chance if we raise and equip a large army and meet the Germans on the field of conflict. We must also take a chance if we now loan our money. We must expect reverses if we equip an army to go across the water to Europe—and we would certainly expect reverses as well as victories, though we trust in ultimate victory in the end—and so it is with our money. It may be that some of these countries to which we extend our credit may make no effective use of it and that money may be lost, but we must take that chance and abide the decree of war. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SLOAN moves to amend section 1 by inserting, after the word "annum," in line 4, page 2, the words "$3,000,000,000 of which shall run for a period not exceeding 20 years."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] have an amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; but that comes later.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has not yet arrived for that. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bonds herein authorized shall first be offered at not less than par as a popular loan, under such regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury as will give all citizens of the United States an equal opportunity to participate therein; and any portion of the bonds so offered and not subscribed for may be otherwise disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury; but no commissions shall be allowed or paid on any bonds issued under authority of this act.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 17, after the word "of" and before the word "by," insert "at not less than par."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 13, after the word "loan," insert "in denominations of $25 and upward."

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I agree with what has practically been said by Members on both sides of the Chamber who have spoken on the question of leaving the entire disposition of this issue of bonds to the executive branch of the Government. But the idea embodied in my amendment has appealed to me very strongly, and I believe it will appeal to the membership of this committee, that a large portion of these bonds issued will be cared for by hundreds of thousands of patriotic citizens of this country of small means who would like to show their patriotism at this time by taking a small stake in their Government.

The trouble and complaint has been made by people in the past when bond issues were made by this Government that the denominations of the bonds were so large that the ordinary citizen who by economy and frugality had saved a few dollars could not take a stake in his Government or purchase bonds of his country. My judgment is, as suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that it is no easy matter for any country on earth to float so gigantic a bond issue as this, and we ought to place at our disposal all the means possible for the immediate subscription to these bonds. My judgment is that if we should issue $500,000,000, or, say, possibly a billion dollars, of these bonds in small denominations of $25, that they would be greedily taken by the public—that is, by citizens of small means.

Now, may I make this observation, and that is all I have to say on this transaction? I am afraid, having read an editorial in one of the leading morning papers of this city this morning, in which they suggest that the entire Congress of the United States be taken out and lined up before a firing squad and shot as deserters. I hope the suggestion of this great daily paper will not be complied with by the people of the country. I sincerely trust that the espionage bill will provide for such cymling-headed, irresponsible, pickle-brained editorial writers as this insulting little meddler, whose breed is readily distingushed by his bray. The people want the matter fully discussed; they do not want a useless consumption of time, but they want to know how and what we are doing with the taxing and appropriating powers of Congress, and they have a right to know; and I believe we have expedited debate on this particular bill, taking into consideration its importance, not only to this generation but the generations to come, as fast as it should have been expedited.

We have got to win this war. It does not make any difference what sacrifices we have to make. It is serious business; it is the most serious situation this Nation ever confronted, and I pray to God that it will never confront a more serious one; and if it takes 10,000,000 men or $50,000,000,000, weighing the consequences to posterity and our free institutions, this war will be won. The United States has got to manfully perform its part of the duty. Now, as has been said, it will be at least a year, or ought to be a year, before we can put a single volunteer or a selective conscriptive soldier into the trenches in Europe, because it would be nothing but governmental murder to put untrained and green men behind our guns in the trenches against seasoned trained soldiers. Therefore the only thing that we can do, whether we get a dollar of this money back or not, is not to be weighed at this time; the consequences of this conflict on this Nation is what we should weigh now and the most expeditious and practical way that we can help in Europe. This bond issue must be floated, and we must appeal to every patriotic American to do his part in helping this Nation float it. I saw a statement a few days ago in one of the financial journals of the country that there were at least in the United States of America to-day in these prosperous times $895,000,000 in hiding, not placed in the savings institutions of this country. Those people have saved and have it in hiding because they have not the confidence in the banking institutions to deposit their money in them and put it at interest. If an opportunity was given to these people who have the money to take an interest in the Government and lend it to the Government by purchasing small bonds, it would be greedily accepted and the bond issue would be floated. My judgment is that if we were to put in this bill a provision that these bonds should be issued in small denominations of $25, that the American public would greedily take them up, as I have stated before. I offer this suggestion, thinking that it might have escaped the attention of the able committee having charge of the bill.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I want to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia. If the gentleman from Georgia can not afford to trust the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury to issue these bonds in denominations that will bring about the best results so far as the people are concerned, as well as for the purposes of the issue of the bonds, then he and Members on that side of the Chamber ought not to question any criticism that comes of the bill from those on the Republican side. I, for one, Mr. Chairman, am perfectly willing to leave to the President of the United States the authority that is granted to him in this bill. We must place this responsibility somewhere. The duty of Congress is to provide the money. The Constitution directs that the authority for the carrying on of war be in the hands of the President of the United States.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Has the gentleman from Missouri lost sight of the fact that what is known as the servant girls' bonds of France absolutely saved the Republic in this war, and that they were in denominations of $5 of our money and upward?

Mr. DYER. I have no criticism of the gentleman's amendment, except that I do not believe we ought to put it on the bill. The President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury must be relied upon to do the very best possible thing for the country and for the objects for which the money is to be raised. Mr. Chairman, this is not an ordinary bond issue. This is a war measure. It is for the purpose of carrying on a war into which we have entered, and every American who is worth the salt that is in him ought to be anxious to do everything he can to give to the President and the Government full and complete authority without, of course, sacrificing the right of Congress as the representatives of the people to discuss these measures and to have them intelligently prepared, presented, and acted upon. But the President is the man at the helm. He is the one who is charged with responsibility in this matter, and any gentleman, whether in this House or outside, who is trying to find fault and to criticize what the Congress has already done in providing that this war shall be waged against the Imperial Government of Germany, in my judgment, does not represent the true American spirit that must and does prevail to-day in this entire country. [Applause.]

So, Mr. Chairman, I want to urge that this amendment be defeated, and that amendments that have a tendency to cripple or to take away from the President the authority to float this bond issue in such a way as he judges to be for the best interests of the people of America, and in such a way as to carry on this war successfully, should be opposed and voted down. I am opposed to the gentleman's amendment, and I am opposed to any amendment which has any such tendency. We want the money provided for in this bill to be expended for the benefit of the people of this country wherever it will do the most good to the American people for the purposes of this war. We want it used wherever it will bring the best and quickest results. We want the war successfully waged in the shortest possible time. As some gentleman has said here upon the floor, I hope that the money here provided will be enough to pay for our part in this war. I doubt it, as all of us must doubt it; but if double the amount provided for here is needed and will result in making unnecessary the sending of our boys to fight in the trenches of Europe, then I am in favor of our voting such other amount.

Mr. Chairman, the city of St. Louis is practically to a man now behind the President in our difficulty with the Imperial Government of Germany. The members of the board of aldermen of that city are a representative body of men. There is a president and 28 members. They come from all sections of the city, one of the 28 coming from each of the 28 wards. Some of them were born in Germany, some are sons of those born in Germany, but they are all patriotic Americans and good citizens of the United States. On the 4th of April this body of men, sitting as the board of aldermen of this city, passed the following resolutions touching our duty in this hour. These resolutions are as follows:

Let it be known that every righteous citizen of the city of St. Louis is loyal to the President of the United States and the administration at Washington, D. C. Any intimation to the contrary we consider an act of disloyalty to the city of St. Louis. We all honor and love the Stars and Stripes, and we will do our utmost to defend the dignity of our Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of five members of this board be appointed by the president of the board of aldermen to act in conjunction with the national administration at Washington to aid in the betterment of local conditions pertaining to national affairs; that we will answer any call for the sake of our national honor; that we will support to the utmost the President and the National Government in the present crisis; and that we will act in accord with any suggestions from the national administration at Washington: Be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the members of the President's Cabinet, and Senators and Congressmen from the State of Missouri.

CLARENCE G. FISCHER,
Clerk, Board of Aldermen.

And, Mr. Chairman, let me add that all the members of this board are Republicans.

Mr. Chairman, I am proud to represent in part the people of St. Louis in this House. They are patriotic and loyal. Many of these people are of German birth or ancestry. They love, of course, the country which they or their fathers came to America from. They have many blood relatives living in that country. They were hoping and praying that we would not have to go to war with Germany. So was I, Mr. Chairman, and I prayed that we might not be compelled to. I hate and detest war. I wanted the United States to remain at peace in this terrific struggle going on in Europe. But it could not be so. The President came to us and told of the repeated outrages and assaults made by the Imperial German Government upon our citizens and our rights as a Nation. He stated that the Emperor of Germany had been waging war upon us and had refused to stop the murderous submarine warfare. He—the President of the United States—asked us as a duty to our country and our national honor to declare war upon the Imperial German Government. With these facts before us, and sworn to do our duty to our people, we voted war. It was to me the saddest hour of my life. I tried to forget everything but my duty. I voted for what was to my mind the right and honorable thing to do. I sincerely hope and pray that I did. I gave long and serious thought to it. I recalled the splendid men and women in my city of German blood. I did not want to do anything that would give them pain and anguish because of their love for the Fatherland and their loved ones in the German Empire. Then it was was made clear to my mind that it was not to be a war upon the people of Germany, but upon its despotic ruler and his Government for the continued insults to our flag and our sovereign rights as a Nation. Action having thus been taken, I, with all the people of my city, are for the American flag and all it represents. We are with the President because he is the head of the Nation and the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. We are all American citizens in this crisis, and no one can or will dare to say that the people of St. Louis, those of German blood and otherwise, are not as good Americans as there are in any place in these United States. We have and will show to the world that in this war we are united and together for American honor and American rights. That as we are in this war we will do our utmost to bring it to an end and stop the terrible sacrifice of life now going on. We also hope to aid in doing the things that will prevent such a recurrence, and especially with so little cause. Our entrance into this war will and must be with due consideration for the people of the countries at war. We must assist to bring about more rights for the German people as against the Emperor, so that he, with all other monarchs, shall give to the people a say in making war and not abrogate to himself the sole power and authority in such matters.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia——

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in seven minutes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like five minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then in 12 minutes. I want 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in 12 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. The idea embodied in the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] is a good one, and it is the idea that is embodied in this section of the bill, that this loan shall be a popular loan. But I am going to vote against his amendment, because I see very clearly that it is not needed. There is nothing in the bill which restricts the amounts in which these bonds shall be issued, and the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia does not provide that any specified sum shall be issued in small denominations, nor does it in any way either enlarge or restrict the power that is now lodged in the Secretary of the Treasury. It expresses, however, the idea which doubtless animates all Members of Congress that this loan should be, as far as possible, a popular loan. But in that connection, and especially as we are now discussing the section as a whole, I want to commend to the attention of the House the suggestion made by Samuel Gompers in the letter read by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], namely, that the limitation upon the postal savings bank be removed and that the funds there deposited be used, as far as possible, to absorb this issue of bonds. In fact, I made the same suggestion when the gentleman from North Carolina was opening the debate upon this bill, and the assurance was extended that the directors of the postal savings fund had full power to employ the money in that way.

I want to call the attention of gentlemen to this: Scarcely a year ago we enlarged the limit of deposits in these postal savings banks. On the 1st of July, 1916, there was $86,000,000 on deposit in these banks. On the 1st of February, 1917, there was $121,000,000 on deposit, or an increase of 50 per cent in a little more than six months' time. Much of that money is deposited by people of what has been referred to by the gentleman from Georgia as the "servant-girl" class. A large amount of it comes from foreigners, those of foreign birth who are American citizens, or who belong to foreign families, or who perhaps are themselves subjects of alien countries.

It might be a matter of great difficulty and some expense and considerable delay to bring to their attention the idea of small bonds, but they understand the Postal Savings Bank System, and they can deposit any amount there from $1 up. They do not need to buy a bond, nor are they obliged to tie their money up in a security which they must afterwards negotiate in order to obtain the cash upon it. So I think we could very easily double the present $125,000,000 on deposit in the Postal Savings Bank. This bank is the natural place of deposit for the poor man, for the laboring man, for the laboring girl, those who are unfamiliar with business but who know the relations of the Federal Government to the people largely through the activities of the Post Office Department, who know their way to the post office, but who do not know their way to the connection with any other of the great departments of the Government. The Postal Savings Bank being well established, having shown its success and having shown how it dovetails into the great industrial and commercial system of this country, I think we can well take off the limit, at least for the period of the war, and permit all this money to come out of hiding that the gentleman from Georgia speaks of—I think he is doubtless correct—and to be put into the custody of Uncle Sam.

Mr. HOWARD. I want to state to the gentleman that about 10 days ago I introduced a bill right on the very lines that he speaks of, and it has been referred to the Post Office Department.

Mr. BORLAND. I know the gentleman's views exactly, and I agree with him in every way. There are 700,000 individual depositors in the Postal Savings Bank to-day. Nearly three-quarters of a million of the workers of this country are to-day doing business over the counters of the Postal Savings Bank.

Mr. HOWARD. There ought to be 10,000,000 of them.

Mr. BORLAND. Talk about widespread patriotism and an immediate response of the people! There is no channel through which we can reach so many of the laboring class at once as through the Postal Savings Bank, in which three-quarters of a million of them are right now depositing their money, which can be exchanged for these bonds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman going to speak to his amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would like to have five minutes; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair suggests that he put the question upon the other amendment first.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Very well.

Mr. OVERMYER. Mr. Chairman, before that is done I ask unanimous consent to have read from the Clerk's desk the following telegram

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

NORWALK, OHIO, April 13, 1917.

A. W. OVERMYER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Great popular demand for $25 denominational bonds. Urge their issuance. Wire us results, rate of interest, and possible date of delivery. Can use $50,000 of this size.

CITIZENS BANKING CO.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I offered reads as follows:

On page 2, line 18, after the word "Treasury," insert "at not less than par."

The paragraph I desire to amend reads as follows:

The bonds herein authorized shall first be offered at not less than par as a popular loan, under such regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury as will give all citizens of the United States an equal opportunity to participate therein; and any portion of the bonds so offered and not subscribed for may be otherwise disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury; but no commissions shall be allowed or paid on any bonds issued under authority of this act—

Embracing all of line 12 and down to and including all of line 19. It, to my mind, plainly confers on the Secretary of the Treasury power to sell any part of the bonds not disposed of under the provision of line 12 and line 13 to the comma after the word "loan" at a price less than par, if, in his judgment, such a sale should be advisable.

Many gentlemen have privately expressed the opinion that the language of the paragraph would be taken as a whole, and each provision would relate to the selling at "not less than par" feature. I could not agree with them. I found other eminent gentlemen taking a view exactly the reverse of theirs, and with them I fully agree. With language so ambiguous and with meaning not clearly plain to everyone, I felt that if the Secretary of the Treasury is not expected to sell any of these bonds at less than par, the paragraph should state so plainly.

By leaving the language uncertain we would invite bond brokers to be slow to bid, hoping to buy below par. They are human and would naturally take advantage of any opportunity afforded under this act to take profits. By leaving this language uncertain we would invite at the outset of this war our bonds to go below par with probably disastrous effect on securities of all kinds. To allow part of the bonds to be sold to our people as a "popular loan" at not less than par and another part to be sold to bond brokers at less than par would be patently unfair. I am glad, indeed, that the chairman of the committee [Mr. KITCHIN] has offered as a committee amendment exactly the same language and accomplishing the same purpose, although inserted after a different word.

Mr. Chairman, I could not or would not have voted for this measure had not that amendment been made. There are other features of this bill that I do not like, and I hope they may be amended before it is put on its final passage. If the $3,000,000,000 bond issue for loaning to foreign Governments to bolster up their practically bankrupt treasuries had been offered in a bill to itself, I feel that I should vote against it. I do not think our people should have to bear that burden; I do not think placing their Governments' bonds with us as security for our flotation is sufficient security for our people. I shall waive my judgment there, as I do not desire to hamper our own effort to speedily prepare to prosecute this deplorable war. This bill, as amended, will have to be either voted up or voted down. I shall vote for the bill as amended.

Mr. Chairman, when the war resolution was under consideration I said:

I shall, while I am a Member of this House, in case this cup is put to our country's lips, vote for everything which, in my judgment, is essential to our success, keeping in mind always the fundamentals of our liberty.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to repeat that. I desire to say that I shall not vote in the judgment of the President of the United States when I think he is wrong, I shall not vote in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury unless I think he is right, nor shall I vote in the judgment of any man and make a rubber stamp of myself, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] as regards himself. I shall do and vote according to the judgment which I have. It may not be right, but it is that which God Almighty has endowed me with, and I shall not delegate my rights here to anyone. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of establishing credits in the United States for foreign Governments the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to purchase from such foreign Governments, at par, their obligations, bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act; to enter into such arrangements as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for purchasing such obligations of foreign Governments and for the subsequent payment thereof, but such arrangements shall provide that if any of the bonds of the United States issued and used for the purchase of such foreign obligations shall thereafter be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 3½ per cent per annum under the provisions of section 5 of this act, then and in that event the obligations of such foreign Governments held by the United States shall be, by such foreign Governments, converted in like manner and extent into obligations bearing the same rate of interest as the bonds of the United States issued under the provisions of section 5 of this act. For the purposes of this section the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use not exceeding $3,000,000,000 of the proceeds of the bonds of the United States that may be sold under authority of section 1 of this act.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and which I think covers the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], in the committee, and of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], on the floor yesterday.

The Clerk reads as follows:

Strike out on page 2 all of lines 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and prosecuting the war by establishing credits in the United States for foreign Governments, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to purchase, at par, from such foreign Governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States their obligations hereafter issued, bearing."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. GREEN of Iowa: After the word "President" insert the following: "and a joint committee of the House and Senate on the conduct of the war, to be selected by Congress in such manner as it shall hereinafter by joint resolution direct."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. KITCHIN. I make the point of order that it is not germane.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, with all deference to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina and the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, I am of opinion that this point of order can not be well taken. This is not a case of introducing a new and different proposition. It simply embodies the proposition now before the House by limiting it in certain respects, or rather by adding to it in certain respects.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule unless the gentleman from North Carolina or the gentleman from Illinois can convince the Chair to the contrary. It seems to the Chair that this is germane. It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall do certain things with the approval of the President and a joint committee of the House and Senate on the conduct of the war, and so forth. The Chair thinks this is germane and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important amendment and I ask the indulgence of the House upon it for a few moments. Those who wish to fully understand it can do so by taking the bills which they have in their hands and looking on line 21, page 2, and inserting the words offered by the amendment right after the word "President" in that line. As I do not happen to have the amendment in my hand I will ask the Clerk to again report it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment, as follows:

After the word "President" insert the following: "and a joint committee of the House and Senate on the conduct of the war, to be selected by Congress in such manner as it shall hereafter by joint resolution direct."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the suggestion that such a committee should be appointed came first from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], and whatever credit there may be in the thought belongs entirely to him. My amendment, so far as this bill is concerned, does not go as far as the bill which I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has introduced, and which is now pending before the Committee on Rules. The provision which is made by that bill goes very much further, but the provision which I would have inserted in this bill does not interfere at all with an enlargement of the powers of that committee as provided by the bill offered by the gentleman from Illinois, so that I hope that the gentleman from Illinois will assist in sustaining this amendment. It is well known to Members of this House—it is no secret at all—that rumors, suspicions, and even charges are being made that great business houses of this country are to profit largely as a result of the loan which is to be made by this bill to foreign countries.

These suspicions and rumors were voiced to some extent by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] on the floor of the House yesterday. The gentleman from New York did not state all of these rumors and suspicions, nor do I think it was proper to do so, although I assume that he is familiar with them. Charges most serious and grave have been made. I place no credence whatever in those rumors, suspicions, or charges, but I do believe that the ground for suspicions, rumors, and charges ought to be removed, and it would be removed if my amendment was carried out. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered involves no distrust of the President. We have given the President our confidence to the fullest extent. We only ask, or I only ask, by this amendment that the President in turn should give us some of his confidence, which seems to be withheld by this bill as it stands. The distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] quoted a short time ago from a statement made by Washington that a war could not be carried on by debating societies. I agree with him entirely, but this amendment is not to establish any debating societies but merely provides for the creation of a committee on the conduct of the war, which can hold, if necessary, secret sessions, which can sit when Congress itself is not in session, which can consider all of these matters, which can take them into consideration and act with the quickness that a small body has power to do and with the discretion which is given by the wisdom of others besides the President.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If I can get a little more time.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman can answer my question very briefly. If the gentleman's legislative committee of watchdogs was created, and some irresponsible person should afterwards make a charge that they had shared in the advantages of some of the loans, would the gentleman be calling for an investigation by this House into the conduct of that committee?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, the gentleman is making an objection which is purely fanciful——

Mr. BORLAND. Not at all; such investigations——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa (continuing). The very purpose of the amendment is to remove any suggestion of that kind. I was about to say that the duties which now devolve upon the President are manifold, too great and numerous for me to mention. He has already devolving upon him more than it is possible for any one man to do. We are now to add to those manifold responsibilities and duties by putting upon him a responsibility that seems to be greater than anyone can bear and greater than any one man can possibly discharge. Mr. Chairman, at this time we ought to consider the fact that the President himself can not attend to duties of this kind. It will not be the President who will determine how this loan shall be awarded or managed——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman's suggestion involves a complete change in our theory of Government; that is, that the legislative branch be clothed with administrative functions along with the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, no. It has been done before. The gentleman will remember that during the time of the Civil War a committee was appointed on the conduct of the war.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know that it ever rendered any services that anybody has ever mentioned, commended, or even boasted of.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I fear the gentleman from New York has not read the history of his country with any great degree of care.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, I have; I have read it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Then the gentleman has made the remark thoughtlessly.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the gentleman's amendment and my amendment close in seven minutes, the gentleman to have five minutes and I to have two minutes.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. I would like to have some time.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and the amendment to the amendment close in 15 minutes. I want two minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have three minutes; I think I said two minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Say 17 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment and the amendment to the amendment close in 17 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. SLOAN. May I inquire of the gentleman if that would give further time to submit another amendment to the amendment if this one should fail?

Mr. KITCHIN. If it is in order, the gentleman can do so by sending the amendment up and having it pending, but there would be no debate on it.

Mr. SLOAN. I would want five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am of the opinion myself that a greater part of this loan ought to be expended in this country and that some provision ought to be made to that effect. I assume, however, that there will be instances where the actual money will be needed by some of the foreign Governments to whom we propose to make this loan. All these matters—how the loan ought to be made, under what conditions it shall be made, with reference to the use of the money, for what purpose it shall be used, whether for our benefit—are the questions involved and all ought to be determined, as it seems to me, by a committee which in some degree manifests the wisdom and the purpose of this House. And let me say that if this be done it would do more to popularize this bill, in my judgment, than any other action this House can take. It would render, as I have said, beyond suspicion the action which we are taking to-day. It would gather to the consideration of the manner in which this money should be expended the wisdom of the highest intellects of this House and of the Senate, and it would insure that the money would be spent in such a manner that none would ever regret his vote in support of this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is recognized.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I have in mind an amendment, which I will not formally offer, but on which I would like to have the opinion of the chairman of the committee, because I recognize that in matters as serious as this we ought to defer very largely to those who have inside information. I intend in questions of this kind to be guided very largely by the opinion of the President and his representative here, for I appreciate that in our foreign affairs he knows facts which he can not safely divulge to us. And, while I would not pretend that the last four years has given me very great confidence in the administration, yet I appreciate that in war times the Executive must be supported, and there must be no divisions; and I am trying now in my mind to cultivate confidence. I have quite a little crop started, and I hope it will flourish and that nothing will blight it.

If I were to follow my own opinion in drafting this bill, I should provide that we should make our loans only to France, Great Britain, Italy, and Russia. What the condition of the Balkan States will be after the war we do not know. Our statesmen know little of the Balkan problem; it is a European question. And how it will be settled by the terms of peace we can not guess, and we should not undertake to make loans to them. Even Belgium, although our sympathy has gone out to her more unstintedly than to any nation except, perhaps, France—even Belgium I would not put upon our list, because she has been financed now for a long time by England, and I would let the money for her continue to go through England. But, while this would be my judgment, I am willing to yield it to the opinion of the committee.

Now, the amendment I have in mind is this, that instead of "foreign Governments" we substitute the words "European Governments." It seems to me that we ought not, out of this $3,000,000,000, to subsidize nations south of us on this continent. Under the present terms we can not loan to any nation that is not in war with Germany. This is a war measure, and it ought not to be diverted to the development of this continent. Take Mexico, or San Domingo, or Haiti. Do you think that they would hesitate for a moment to declare war against Germany if thereby they thought they could become beneficiaries under this $3,000,000,000? But I do not think just because they declared war against Germany that this war revenue ought to be loaned to them in order to build up Governments there. I would like to relieve the President from the responsibility or possibility of lending to Mexico, for instance, any of this sum. Personally, it seems to me that we ought not, under this general clause of lending to any nation at war, to open an avenue for subsidizing these republics to the south of us. And I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] whether he sees any objection to putting in as a substitute for the word "foreign" the word "European" and thereby relieve the President from the pressure of having some of the republics at the south of us coming as suppliants?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman I do not think there will be any danger of the South American countries coming to us as suppliants, and I do not think it would be wise for us to put in "European Governments." I have no idea that the emergency or the occasion will occur that the gentleman anticipates.

Mr. GILLETT. Then what is the objection to putting it in?

Mr. KITCHIN. We just ought not to advise other countries with which we are at war that we are not to do that.

Mr. GILLETT. I think we ought to remember that in transactions as large as this mistakes and scandals are liable to arise. I say this without the slightest implication on the high purposes of either the President or the Secretary of the Treasury. I remember one great international scandal where the agent of a great foreign Government was charged with openly seeking bribes in connection with loan transactions with this country, and the publication of the "X Y Z letters" almost saved the life of an expiring political party here. And it seems to me we ought to be solicitous, if we can, to put barriers against any such imputation. We must bear in mind that the Secretary of the Treasury will hold a very anomalous position. He will stand with three thousand million dollars in his pocket ready to give them away to worthy applicants. Never was there such an almoner in the history of the world before. We read of the troubles of our philanthropic millionaires who have a reputation for giving away money—men like Carnegie or Rockefeller—how they are besieged with requests; but their distribution is insignificant compared with this. The Secretary will doubtless be attacked through his sympathies, through his avarice, through every motive, honest and dishonest, which it is thought will tempt him to yield up his spoils. We ought to protect him from such appeals as far as possible.

It seems to me that such an amendment would tend to prevent that. As I have said, in these matters I am going to defer to the administration, which knows conditions and possibilities hidden from me, but I think that that would be an important and prudent amendment.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I want to know if your recently inspired confidence has already suffered a blight?

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, no. What do you mean?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I mean, do you not think we can trust the administration not to be loaning promiscuously?

Mr. GILLETT. Well, my confidence in the administration's conduct of Mexican affairs perhaps has been as small as it has in any direction, and I would not want to see the administration exposed to a request from Mexico for what would amount to a subsidy. I think we might reasonably prevent it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MASON. If the gentleman will yield just one minute, I want to call the attention of the Chairman to this. I think the point of order was well made not only upon the question being germane, but to adopt this amendment now would leave us in the legislative absurdity of saying that this law is to become effective upon the passage of another law by the Congress, or a joint resolution, and if hereafter Congress fails to pass a joint resolution establishing this committee, then the whole act that you are now engaged in passing falls to the ground, because by the terms of the act the Secretary, with the consent of the President and by the terms of the amendment, must have the consent of the committee yet to be appointed, which must be appointed by an act of Congress.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman think if the House and Senate adopted this amendment they would thereafter fail to appoint a committee?

Mr. MASON. I do not know; but I say it is a legislative absurdity to say that this act has to await the action of another act, and for that reason I shall vote against it, although I am in favor of appointing a general committee, such as was had during the Civil War, for advice with the Executive of this Government.

The CHAIRMAN. There are three minutes remaining. The Chair feels that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] should be recognized.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like to have one minute. I thought we agreed that the time should be closed.

Mr. SLOAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was in error. Eight minutes remained, and then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] used one minute, leaving seven minutes. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I assume that the amendment submitted by the chairman of the committee will prevail. I am in favor of the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN]. I did not know that that amendment had been prepared, and so I prepared one for the same purpose. But if for any reason the amendment to the amendment should not prevail, either on account of the complication suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] or otherwise, I have pending an amendment to the amendment which I shall ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SLOAN offers an amendment to the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee: After the word "President" insert the following: "after he has been advised by the Speaker and the minority leader of the House of Representatives and the President pro tempore and the minority leader of the Senate."

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment to which the objection of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] will not lie. Because we have a Speaker of the House of Representatives and a minority leader; we have a President pro tempore of the Senate and a minority leader of the Senate. Both sides of each of the legislative chambers would be well and ably represented. And it seems to me that if we desired to distribute the burden and in a measure relieve the Chief Executive of some of the onerous duties that devolve upon him and at the same time specially inspire the confidence of the investing public, and as a result thereof to make an advantageous sale of the bonds, we could do nothing better than to adopt this amendment. We would call into council with the President before he makes his approval of these great loans to those nations the officials I have named.

To have it known to the country that the great minority leader, of many years' service in the Senate, and the statesman who presides over that eminent body; the great student and able, keen, industrious statesman who has been for many years the minority leader of the House, and lastly the distinguished Speaker, who is beloved and trusted on both sides of this Chamber, and in whom the American people repose special confidence, would be consulted before a loan was made would mean much in the floating of these bonds and increase the amount that we received from the sale of this stupendous amount of bonds. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] is a legislative absurdity. I go further and say that in my opinion the idea of having a joint committee of Congress to work out the conduct of the war with the Executive of the Nation and the Secretary of the Treasury is an absurd one, and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] makes it no better.

Indeed, his amendment shows how absurd these propositions are. He wants us to put in the amendment an officer that does not exist. There is no such thing known to the law as a "minority leader." That is a caucus proposition. That is not law. There is no officer known in law as a minority leader. The gentleman from Nebraska includes in his proposed committee the minority leader, and the Speaker of the House, and the President pro tempore and the minority leader of the Senate, to be officers constituting this war board. Why, gentlemen, in my opinion the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska is really just a little more absurd than the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I believe at one time in this country they did have such a board as this, during the Civil War, and possibly that board was created in order to embarrass President Lincoln. It put handcuffs and hobbles upon him. I do not believe that these gentlemen desire to handcuff and hobble the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, but if this amendment were put in the bill this committee would handicap and hobble the Executive.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I have listened to what the gentleman said about the Civil War Committee on the Conduct of the War having been appointed for the purpose of embarrassing President Lincoln. The chairman of that committee was Zachariah Chandler, of Michigan, than whom there never lived any better fighter on the right side in that war. It is impossible that a committee of which he was chairman was organized for the purpose of embarrassing the President. His loyalty and enthusiasm in a just cause would not have permitted him to countenance or engage in any move to embarrass Mr. Lincoln.

Mr. KITCHIN. But he was not the author of the resolution.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. He was chairman of the committee.

Mr. KITCHIN. We would get good men. Mr. MANN would be a good man; Mr. CLARK would be a good man. The President pro tempore of the Senate and the majority leader of the Senate would be good men, as good as the late Mr. Chandler; but we ought not to embarrass the fighting power and the President and the Secretary of the Treasury by any committee of the best of men. We belong to the legislative branch. Why mix us up on a committee with the executive branch of the Government?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I was not speaking of the merits of this proposition.

Mr. KITCHIN. It has no merit.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I was simply answering the challenge the gentleman made that that committee was organized for the purpose of embarrassing the President.

Mr. KITCHIN. I referred to the resolution appointing the committee.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If I understand the position of the gentleman from North Carolina, it is that Congress, which customarily directs the appropriations and provides precisely how they shall go, should have not one word to say about what should be done with this money.

Mr. KITCHIN. There never was power given to the President or Secretary of the Treasury to sell bonds which had coupled with it any other committee or any other person. This is the first suggestion of the kind I have ever heard.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman knows that no such occasion as this, or anything like it, has ever arisen.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Vote!

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. GREEN of Iowa) there were—ayes 19, noes 125.

Accordingly the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I now offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SLOAN: Amend by inserting, after the word "President," the following: "after he has been advised by the Speaker and the minority leader of the House of Representatives and the President pro tempore and the minority leader of the Senate."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3 strike out all of line 17, after the word "section," and strike out lines 18, 19, and 20 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"There is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not to exceed the sum of $3,000,000,000: Provided, That the authority granted by this section to the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase bonds from foreign Governments as aforesaid shall cease upon the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government."

Mr. KITCHIN. I move the adoption of that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LENROOT: Page 3, line 5, after the word "thereof," insert the words "before maturity."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, we will accept that amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not care to discuss it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, that other amendment that was agreed to was not in the form in which it was privately submitted, but as I recall it provided "not to exceed $3,000,000,000."

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That is not a very good form of appropriation.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think so. It appropriates not to exceed $3,000,000,000.

Mr. MANN. How much is appropriated?

Mr. KITCHIN. Anything less than that—not to exceed $3,000,000,000.

Mr. MANN. It is not the usual form. The usual form appropriates $3,000,000,000, "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. KITCHIN. This is not to exceed $3,000,000,000—any necessary amount not exceeding that.

Mr. MANN. I presume it would accomplish the purpose. I do not, however, recall any appropriation in that form. I am really talking to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. KITCHIN. I am not going to expose him.

Mr. MANN. It ought to be $3,000,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. KITCHIN. I want to satisfy everybody, and I think that would be the better language to use. I ask unanimous consent to return to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent to vacate the vote by which the last amendment proposed by him was adopted. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, I modify it by inserting, after the figures "$3,000,000,000," the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. MANN. That is what you want—

There is appropriated the sum of $3,000,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Striking out the words "not to exceed."

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to modify the amendment as indicated. The Clerk will report the amendment as it will read when so modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, strike out all of line 17 after the word "section" and strike out all of lines 18, 19, and 20 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"There is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. KITCHIN. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the amendment being modified as requested?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. MANN. Let us have that reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported, as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LENROOT: Page 3, line 5, after the word "thereof," insert the words "before maturity."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he does not mean "on or before maturity," not merely limiting it to "before maturity"?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I do not.

Mr. KITCHIN. The proper expression is "before maturity." "On or before" would not fit in there at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is hereby authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States from time to time such sums heretofore authorized by section 39 of the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes"; section 124 of the act approved June 3, 1916, entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes"; section 13 of the act of September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a United States Shipping Board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries, to regulate carriers by water engaged in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States, and for other purposes"; section 400 of the act approved March 3, 1917, entitled "An act to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes"; and the public resolution approved March 4, 1917, entitled "Joint resolution to expedite the delivery of materials, equipment, and munitions and to secure more expeditious construction of ships," as may be necessary to meet public expenditures on account of the Mexican situation, the construction of the armor-plate plant, the construction of the Alaskan Railway, the purchase of the Danish West Indies, the construction of the nitrate plant, the purposes of sections 5 and 11 of the shipping act, emergency naval construction or expediting naval construction, or to reimburse the Treasury for such expenditures or to reimburse the Treasury for reimbursable expenditures made on account of the construction of the Panama Canal, or for such additional amount, not exceeding $63,945,460, as may be necessary to redeem the 3 per cent loan of 1908 to 1918 maturing August 1, 1918. And for such sums as he may borrow under authority of this section the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue bonds of the United States in the manner and under the terms and conditions prescribed in section 1 of this act; and the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion and under such terms and conditions as he may impose, may refund the 3 per cent loan of 1908 to 1918 maturing August 1, 1918, into bonds of the United States of like tenor as those authorized in section 1 of this act. The bonds authorized by this section shall be in addition to the bonds authorized by section 1 of this act.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On pages 4, 5, and 6 strike out all of section 4 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is hereby authorized to issue the bonds not already issued heretofore authorized by section 39 of the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes'; section 124 of the act approved June 3, 1916, entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes'; section 13 of the act of September 7, 1916, entitled 'An act to establish a United States Shipping Board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries, to regulate carriers by water engaged in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States, and for other purposes'; section 400 of the act approved March 3, 1917, entitled 'An act to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes'; and the public resolution approved March 4, 1917, entitled 'Joint resolution to expedite the delivery of materials, equipment, and munitions and to secure more expeditious construction of ships,' in the manner and under the terms and conditions prescribed in section 1 of this act.

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States from time to time, in addition to the sum authorized in section 1 of this act, such additional amount, not exceeding $63,945,460, as may be necessary to redeem the 3 per cent loan of 1908 to 1918 maturing August 1, 1918, and to issue therefor bonds of the United States in the manner and under the terms and conditions prescribed in section 1 of this act."

Mr. KITCHIN. This amendment is proposed to meet the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Wyoming, in order to make the section clear and definite and to eliminate the unnecessary descriptive matter.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina a question, and that is if it would not be possible to so amend this section as to enable the Members of this body to go to their constituents and explain section 4? The gentleman's amendment to section 4 does not make the work performed by the committee any clearer to me than does the first section 4, and I dare say it does not to other gentlemen on the floor. At the end of line 17, page 4, it seems to me that it ought to state how much is made available by the section. The amendment offered by the gentleman seems to contain the same defect that the original section does, that it does not inform the Members as to the amount that the section makes available.

Mr. KITCHIN. To save a little work, the gentleman can go to the library and in a few minutes find out the amount.

Mr. JUUL. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I can find out what the various acts appropriate.

Mr. KITCHIN. We never reenact these acts. We simply refer to them by title. That is the usual legislative way.

Mr. JUUL. I hope the gentleman will bear with me, I know the system; but by referring to the former acts I could not find out the amounts now available.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman can find out from the Treasury Department. They issue a statement every day.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from North Carolina can give the information; it is in the report.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; it gives the total number of bonds now available to be issued.

Mr. JUUL. That is not what I want; I can get that all myself.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman tell me just exactly what he does want?

Mr. JUUL. I want, without reference to the department, to know what amount of money is now made available through section 4. I want to know what amount of bonds is changed from a lower rate of interest to a higher.

Mr. KITCHIN. Section 4 authorizes the increase in the interest rate on $472,000,000 worth of bonds now authorized by law.

Mr. JUUL. Would there be any great harm in stating after each section what amount is still undisposed of?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, we never do that.

Mr. JUUL. Would it not be a good thing to do? Then we could go home and tell the people what we voted for, and under this section I can not.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman can tell them that he voted in section 4 to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the amount of $472,000,000 of bonds heretofore authorized, under the same terms and conditions as those provided for the bonds to be issued under section 1 of this bill. What I have just said now will be in the RECORD to-morrow morning, and the gentleman can cut it out and send it to them.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois made a pertinent inquiry and I think the gentleman from North Carolina ought to answer it in good faith.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; I do not think the gentleman ought to embarrass a new Member of Congress.

Mr. JUUL. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I do not want to criticize anyone, but I want simply to learn what I am voting for.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is more sensitive about this than the other gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL]—the younger gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JUUL. Yes?

Mr. KITCHIN. Is the gentleman embarrassed at all in the answers that I have made?

Mr. JUUL. No; and if so, I hope I shall get over it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me answer the gentleman. One bond authorization under existing law is to meet expenditures incident to the Mexican situation, estimated at $162,000,000. Those bonds have been authorized under one of the acts mentioned.

Mr. JUUL. Pardon me again. There is nowhere that by referring to these former acts we can find out what amounts of these bonds, if any, have been disposed of.

Mr. KITCHIN. Not by former acts.

Mr. JUUL. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman mean how many have been authorized and disposed of?

Mr. JUUL. That is it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Or how many have been authorized?

Mr. JUUL. And have not been disposed of. If you please, in line 17 of the printed bill, if, after the word "purposes," the following words were inserted "of which the sum of blank dollars have not been expended," it would not take the gentleman introducing the bill 10 minutes to get from the various departments what the various sums amounted to, and it would enable me and every Member on this floor to go home to his constituents and tell them he knew what he was voting for.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman understands that no bill carries the evidence and testimony of the departments, but the report will show how many bonds are outstanding and how many bonds are authorized to be issued under these various acts referred to in section 4.

Mr. JUUL. But supposing an editor in my district should ask me for how many dollars I voted under this increased interest in Panama bonds, what would I answer?

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman would just go to the report of the committee which accompanies the bill and that gives the fact and the evidence and the information that the gentleman wants.

Mr. MANN. Two hundred and twenty-two million dollars of Panama bonds still unissued. Why not say so?

Mr. KITCHIN. I was reading each one of these to the gentleman.

Mr. JUUL. What would be the harm in putting these amounts in the bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not reckon there would be any harm about it, but if you give all such evidence and facts in a bill——

Mr. JUUL. It is not evidence, but it is sums of money I am expected to vote for.

Mr. KITCHIN. The reports show that. Does the gentleman understand that with each one of these bills when the committee considers it there is a report printed and that that report gives all of the facts and some of the reasons why the bill has been reported?

Mr. JUUL. I have been reading it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Did not the gentleman find the information he wanted in the report?

Mr. JUUL. Not in detail.

Mr. MANN. If my colleague will yield to me for a moment, I think I can explain the difficulty and why it does not appear in the bill.

Mr. JUUL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. There are $222,000,000 of Panama Canal bonds still unissued, which have been authorized at 3 per cent. There are $100,000,000 under another act, $150,000,000 under another act, so that there are three acts making $472,000,000; but of the Panama Canal bonds we have already authorized an issuance of $50.000,000 for a particular purpose, and in another place I believe $20,000,000 for a particular purpose, under different acts. That makes five acts. All five of those acts are referred to in the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], but you can not duplicate the amounts in each of the five acts, because if you did, it would amount to at least $70,000,000 more than the total which has been really authorized.

Mr. JUUL. I would not want that. I would simply want that bill to state the amount that remained unexpended.

Mr. MANN. That is a matter, of course, for the department, but we would know the amount. That is stated in the report of the committee.

Mr. JUUL. I do not know it, and I think there are a hundred gentlemen on the floor who do not know it.

Mr. MANN. They will know it after I have stated it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like to say that none of the bonds authorized under these acts have been issued except the Panama Canal bonds.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That any series of bonds issued under authority of sections 1 and 4 of this act may, under such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, be convertible into bonds bearing a higher rate of interest than the rate at which the same were issued if any subsequent series of bonds shall be issued at a higher rate of interest on or before December 31, 1918.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SLOAN: I move to strike out section 5.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, this is an entirely new system for the issue of bonds in this country. It has never been resorted to before and ripened into legislation. There is no foreign country that has substantially followed it. I understand from an intimation of a very indefinite character that Germany was seeking to work out the system, but, from all I can learn, has made only a limited application of the principle. Moreover, it is a desperate resort she is driven to rather than a system of wise choice starting from a solid foundation. The proposition is that whenever there is an issue of bonds at a given rate and the exigencies of the nation thereafter within a given period shall call for another issue, and the bond market is such that it would prompt the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the bonds of the second series or a third series, as the case may be, at a higher rate of interest, automatically that would raise the interest upon the former issue. To be more explicit, it gives the holders of the original issue the right to convert their bonds issued at the lower rate into bonds of the higher rate. The effect of it would be, to illustrate in this case, we are issuing $5,000,000,000 of bonds. If before the first of next year another issue of, say, only $100,000,000 or, say, $500,000,000 shall be required in this country, and the bond market, whether from legitimate operations or being manipulated by the heavy bond operators, should indicate that the 3½ per cent bonds could not be floated at par, then he would be forced to issue the new series at, say, 4 per cent. When it was issued at 4 per cent, automatically the holders of the first $5,000,000,000 bonds issued could exchange their bonds for 4 per cent bonds. This would make a difference of one-half per cent, or interest amounting to $25,000,000 per year. If the bonds issued have 30 years to run, it would make a difference of three-quarters of a billion dollars to come out of the American taxpayers during the life of the bonds. Now, I am not convinced that that is the wisest course to take at this time, and I offered my motion for the purpose of taking the temper of the House, believing that it is not a sound financial procedure at this time.

This same plan was put through the House without challenging consideration in the armed-neutrality bill last session. It involved $100,000,000. Later an attempt was made to run through this same plan in the $150,000,000 special preparedness measure, but after full hearing it was cut out by the Ways and Means Committee. This is one of the measures now being run through during the honeymoon period of the great war. It is idle now to strenuously resist it. But a year from now it will not bear its present pleasing aspect. This will give the original buyers a double claim to the Government's only one. It opens the way to surrender, not to the original bond buyers but to the holders some months hereafter, an opportunity to take advantage of the Government's necessities to compel it to yield any advantage it might have acquired in the sale.

Then, after five billions of bonds have been purchased bearing 3½ per cent, what a pressure will be brought to create a necessity for another issue bearing a higher rate. The prize offered in section 5, which I seek to strike out, is too great and too tempting to place before a bond-buying or a bond-manipulating combination.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope this amendment will be voted down——

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments be closed in five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman make that six minutes, so that I may have one minute?

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, I will say six minutes.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope this amendment and any amendment of a similar character may be voted down——

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Connecticut if he is in favor of the amendment?

Mr. HILL. No, sir; I am against it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then I will not want any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in——

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say 12 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. In 12 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that this amendment may be rejected, and all amendments of a similar character looking to striking out the convertible feature of this bond issue. In my judgment it would be fatal to the success of this loan. I understand that England has adopted this policy during the war, with regard to some of her loans at least, but not with reference to the loans floated in this country. Germany has adopted the policy of allowing subscribers to earlier loans to subscribe again for newer higher rate interest loans and paying for those subscriptions with first bond issues at par. No human being in this country to-day knows where we are going to land in this war, whether it is going to be one year, three years, or five years, or more. If it runs for two, three, or five years, this country will have an indebtedness of from fifteen to twenty-five billion dollars, and it is going to be hard work——

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I can not yield; I have but five minutes, and I have a lot to say—it is going to be hard work and require an enormous expenditure of money for advertising to encourage the patriotic spirit of this country to take seven and one-half billions of dollars of the bonds and certificates at three and a half per cent. I hope it can be done, but a very eminent authority, probably the most eminent in this country, in the New York papers this morning advises against the flotation of this loan at this time on this ground: That 70 per cent of all the foreign loans that have been taken since this war began in this country have been taken in New York. He infers therefore that 30 per cent of this bond issue, or a billion five hundred million dollars of it, must be taken outside of New York if the same course is pursued, and he declares that it is impossible to get three and a half billion dollars on a three and a half per cent basis floated in New York City now. It can be done, gentlemen; but it will take time, and it has got to be done through the instrumentalities of the savings banks, the great insurance companies, and the patriotic spirit of the working people of this country, who have saved small amounts of money. They are entitled to just as much interest, if they come forward first, as the men who come a year from now and invest in a 4 or 5 per cent loan. It would be fatal to the war if the United States was prevented from successfully floating its first loan, and I hope sincerely that this amendment and all others of a similar character may be voted down. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, before the European war began I think there was a general consensus of opinion throughout the world that no modern war could last very long. I feel quite certain that when the war began in Europe the opinion in this country—certainly in this House—was that it probably would not last so long as three or four months. Nearly every nation that engages in war starts in with the idea that it is soon to be over. A nation rarely has gone to war which believed that it is not soon to gain a victory, and we are now feeling that optimism of opinion that the European war will soon be over, since we have entered upon it. We are now authorizing a loan of $3,000,000,000 to the nations engaged on our side of the war. But who knows how long the war will last; who knows how soon they will be able to gain a great victory on the sea or break through the German lines either on the east or the west of Germany?

Certainly nothing which has taken place up to date gives any great confidence in the early termination of the war. And we will be escaping very luckily if we are not called upon to loan more money to the nations on our side and if we are not called upon to raise great sums of money in our own country to finance our end of the war here. If the war last long, you can not expect to pay the expenses of it all out of current revenues. Those people who now subscribe to the bonds which we offer for sale ought to have the same terms as those who hold back in order to subscribe for bonds subsequently issued. If we desire to encourage the idea of people subscribing for these bonds, we ought to say to them now, "We will give you just as good terms if you give us your money now as we will if you wait for a year to loan it to us then." [Applause.] And if we have other bonds to issue it is not unlikely that we will have to raise the rate of interest. Every European country engaged in the war has had to raise her rate of interest as she added to her indebtedness, and if we add to our indebtedness we are not likely to escape any better. I am not sure that the date fixed in the bill—December 31, 1918—ought not to be made further in the distance.

Mr. HILL. To continue for the war.

Mr. MANN. I believe that if we ask people to loan us their money now we ought to say to them, "We will give you just as good terms and take just as good care of you for advancing your money as we will if you keep it in the bank until we are harder up and have to pay a higher rate of interest." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. My understanding of this section 5 is that if the Congress finds itself obliged to issue additional bonds prior to December 31, 1918, that then the Secretary of the Treasury will have authority to raise to the new rate of interest that Congress may fix the existing rate of interest?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is true. Of course he can not raise any of the rates beyond the 3½ per cent unless an act of Congress hereafter gives him such authority.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is not stated in terms that Congress is to have this authority.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, yes; it is. If you read the first two lines of section 5, you will see that it reads "that any series of bonds issued under authority of sections 1 and 4 of this act." Bonds issued under sections 1 and 4 can not exceed 3½ per cent. So the Secretary of the Treasury must come back to Congress to get authority to issue bonds bearing a higher rate of interest than 3½ per cent. If Congress gives that authority, then the Secretary of the Treasury has the right to convert the bonds issued at this rate into bonds bearing the higher rate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The question with me was whether we might not strike out the word "issued" and insert "authorized by Congress," so that the congressional status would be fixed and understood now. If the gentleman thinks the word "issued" is sufficient as implying that Congress must act, I am satisfied.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have no doubt about that. Additional authority from Congress is necessary in order to issue any bonds at a rate in excess of 3½ per cent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In short, then, Congress must come together again and authorize any issue of bonds that would be affected by section 5?

Mr. KITCHIN. Absolutely.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think I got the gentleman's idea, but I do not know whether I did or not. All the bonds authorized by this bill will not be issued at once, I understand?

Mr. KITCHIN. I should think it would take several months.

Mr. HAMLIN. They will be issued in series. As I understand the bill, if some later series of this $5,000,000,000 authorized can not be floated at 3½ per cent, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to float them at the higher rate?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will it take another act of Congress?

Mr. KITCHIN. The Secretary of the Treasury will have to come back to Congress to get an act authorizing him to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That in addition to the bonds authorized by sections 1 and 4 of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to borrow from time to time, on the credit of the United States, for the purposes of this act and to meet public expenditures authorized by law, such sum or sums as, in his judgment, may be necessary, and to issue therefor certificates of indebtedness at not less than par in such form and subject to such terms and conditions and at such rate of interest, not exceeding 3½ per cent per annum, as he may prescribe; and each certificate so issued shall be payable, with the interest accrued thereon, at such time, not exceeding one year from the date of its issue, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. Certificates of indebtedness herein authorized shall not bear the circulation privilege, and the sum of such certificates outstanding shall at no time exceed in the aggregate $2,000,000,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Of course I know what the term "circulation privilege" is intended to mean, or, at least, I think I do. These are certificates of indebtedness. I think the chairman of the committee ought to state what is meant by those words, because I do not think they have ever appeared in any law heretofore in reference to certificates of indebtedness or anything of that kind.

Mr. KITCHIN. It means they shall not be receivable by the Treasurer of the United States as security for the issue of circulating notes to national banks. In other words, to say that they shall not bear the circulation privilege has no force, because they would not have it if the provision had been omitted.

Mr. MANN. I know that also; and it might be considered by somebody to mean, unless that appeared otherwise here, that these certificates of indebtedness could not circulate from hand to hand. Now, I judge that is not the purpose.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is not the purpose, of course.

Mr. MANN. If one of these certificates of indebtedness is issued to a bank, that bank has the power to hand it over to somebody else.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said "Oh, no." He means "Oh, yes."

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, yes. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER. Now, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will get out of that by saying that I said "Oh, no" to the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Laughter.] Now I yield to him.

Mr. GARDNER. As a matter of fact we have already used that expression, "bearing the circulation privilege," in connection with the bonds, and I understand that its meaning has been thoroughly well understood in the past. You will find it on page 7.

Mr. MANN. We have used it with reference to bonds, but never as to certificates of indebtedness. Now, under the law the certificates of indebtedness are not to be used anyhow as a basis for the issuance of national-bank circulation. They could not be used for that, regardless of this, and when we put this provision in the bill I wanted the statement to be made that that is what is referred to, and not the actual circulation of the certificates of indebtedness themselves.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the bill would have the same meaning even if that provision were left out.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Is it not true that in 1907, when a lack of available currency was so manifest, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Cortelyou, ruled that the temporary certificates of indebtedness should have the circulation privilege? As I understand it, this overrules that ruling of the Treasury Department, and puts these certificates on the market on their own merits, without regarding them as a basis for the circulation privilege.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is my understanding.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Was anything stated about the amount under which these certificates should be issued?

Mr. KITCHIN. Two billions.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I mean in separate denominations.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is there any penalty or provision against using them as money, provided a person wanted to accept them as a circulation medium?

Mr. KITCHIN. They would not be issued in such denominations as would permit that. They would be in large denominations. They would run for only one year. I suppose they would be in denominations of hundreds of thousands or millions.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How are the denominations to be determined?

Mr. KITCHIN. I suppose they would be in denominations of hundreds and thousands.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Not in smaller amounts?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be recognized in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I desire to have read at the desk an interview contained in the Washington Post this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee desires to have read at the desk an interview contained in a clipping.

Mr. KITCHIN. One minute, Mr. Chairman. What is the subject of that interview?

Mr. AUSTIN. It will be read in my own time, so that if the gentleman is patient he will get it all. I am opposed to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have as much patience as others have. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, what does the clipping relate to?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know.

Mr. KEATING. Then, I object.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I have been recognized.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the gentleman should object to the reading of pertinent matter by some one else.

Mr. KEATING. This was not a matter of unanimous consent?

Mr. AUSTIN. No. I was recognized in opposition to the pro forma amendment for five minutes. I desire to use a portion of the time by having this clipping read in my own time.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Tennessee has been recognized for five minutes, as a matter of course he has the right to have it read; but as a matter of unanimous consent he has not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state the rule of the House is this: A gentleman recognized can occupy the floor for five minutes. A paper can be read only by unanimous consent.

Mr. KEATING. I withdraw my objection, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

VANDERLIP ADVISES DELAY IN LOAN—SHOULD NOT BE FLOATED ALL AT ONCE, BANKER SAYS.

CHICAGO, April 13.

Frank A. Vanderlip, president of the National City Bank of New York, arrived here today from the East. The purpose of his visit, he said, was "to sense the western feeling in regard to the financial situation and the proposed $5,000,000,000 loan."

"It will take some time to raise such an amount, and there should be no attempt to float it all at once," he continued. "Seventy per cent of previous loans to the allies has been contributed from New York. That would indicate that a very large portion of the $5,000,000,000 must be raised in New York. There is no service more important than that of the bond selling, and the one who is instrumental in placing bonds is doing as great a service for his country as the man who enlists in the Army."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That in order to pay all necessary expenses, including rent, connected with any operations under this act, a sum not exceeding one-fifth of 1 per cent of the amount of bonds and one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of certificates of indebtedness herein authorized is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 7, line 17, after the word "appropriated," insert the words "or as much thereof as may be necessary."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FITZGERALD: Page 7, line 14, after the word "exceeding," strike out "one-fifth" and insert in lieu thereof "one-tenth."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, as far back as can be discovered the customary appropriations for the expense in connection with the issuance of bonds by the Government has been one-tenth of 1 per cent. One-tenth of 1 per cent of the $5,000,000,000 authorized under this act will make available $5,000,000. In addition, one-tenth of 1 per cent of the $2,000,000,000 of certificates of indebtedness makes $2,000,000. So that if this amendment were adopted $7,000,000 would be available to defray all the expenses incurred by the issuance of these bonds and these certificates of indebtedness. It is proposed, instead of making the customary appropriation, to increase by 100 per cent the amount available for the issuance of bonds and to appropriate $10,000,000 to pay the expenses of the issuance of the $5,000,000,000 of bonds and $2,000,000 to pay the expense of the issuance of the $2,000,000,000 of certificates of indebtedness.

The entire annual expense of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing under the regular appropriations amounts to $4,195,000, and we are proposing to appropriate for the issuance of these bonds, including, of course, some other expenses, a sum three times the total annual appropriations for the maintenance of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

If we adopt the amendment which I offer, we will appropriate almost 200 per cent in excess of the current appropriations for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. Within five weeks, under the act approved on the 3d and 4th of March, Congress authorized the issuance of $250,000,000 of bonds, with the usual one-tenth of 1 per cent appropriation. It was not suggested then that that appropriation would be inadequate.

The question was not raised. There was no intimation that one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of the bonds would not be adequate for the purpose. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, the greater the volume of bonds to be issued the less relatively will be the cost. To advertise $5,000,000,000 of bonds for sale should not take a much greater sum for advertising purposes than to advertise $200,000,000, if the issue is to be submitted all at one time. But upon the theory that some expenses have increased we are proposing to give this enormous sum of $5,000,000 additional to the customary amount. I have the report of the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the last fiscal year. The increased cost of the work in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing last year was 4.8 per cent. One of the items which it was asserted would very materially increase the cost was the price of paper. We are paying for paper 34¼ cents per pound. It is expected that next year there will be some increase in the contract price, but the total appropriation for the distinctive paper used in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is only $521,000, and the cost of the paper is not a dominating feature of the cost of doing this work. I assume that everyone in the House is anxious to make ample provision for everything necessary in connection with the issuance of these bonds, but I am quite confident that if we make available $7,000,000, to be expended for all the purposes connected with the issuance of the bonds, without limitation or restriction of any kind, without hampering the department in any way as to how the money shall be expended, or what compensation, if any, shall be paid to persons who may be employed, we will have appropriated more than can be used.

The Panama Canal loan of $130,000,000 under the act of June 28, 1902, had available $130,000 for expense purposes. The Panama Canal act of August 5, 1909, authorizing $290,000,000 of bonds, had available $290,000. The Mexican loan of March 3, 1917——

Mr. KITCHIN. There was not $290,000,000 issued under the act of August 5, 1909. The amount issued was $29,000,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The authorized loan of $290,000,000 and the appropriation, one-tenth of 1 per cent, was $290,569.

Mr. KITCHIN. But we never issued the $290,000,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; we have not issued them, but that money is available, and I am coming to the point I wish to make.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Inquiry to-day in that bureau of the Treasury Department that has charge of these matters discloses the fact that all of the cost of printing the bonds issued under the acts which I have mentioned was borne out of the regular appropriations for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, without drawing upon this appropriation of one-tenth of 1 per cent.

There is another thing. Within the last five or six years the substitution of improved machinery and methods in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing—the substitution of power presses for hand presses—has very greatly lessened the cost and speeded up the output, so that the unit cost in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to-day, despite the increased cost of material, is less than it was 10 or 15 years ago, and the increase of 4.8 per cent in the last year was due very largely to the fact that the total output of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was less than the year previous, and the volume of work enters very largely into the question of unit cost. If the enormous quantity of work resulting from the bond issue is put into the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, so that that bureau will be utilized to its fullest capacity and to its utmost efficiency, there will be not a proportionate increase, but the unit cost will be less.

Mr. DEWALT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. I should like to ask the gentleman what proportion of the expense of issuing these bonds is for their printing by the bureau?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know. There will be some expenses, of course, in addition to the expenses of engraving the plates, purchasing the material, and the labor of the printing, but the formal advertisements which will be issued throughout the country in the press and in different kinds of financial publications do not vary materially when $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 bonds are to be issued and when $1,000,000,000 are to be issued. As a matter of fact, I assume that one of the ways in which these bonds will be called largely to the attention of the public will be through the local post offices in the various communities of the country, and it seems incredible that it will require an additional expenditure of $5,000,000. If it does, if there be any reason for that additional expenditure, of course no one will hesitate to vote it; but in view of our experience and of our knowledge of the past, without some substantial statement of facts being presented, I am unwilling to vote what I believe to be an unnecessary grant of $5,000,000 for this purpose, and I hope the amendment will prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire five minutes, and I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close at the end of five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. I believe every one will concede that we ought to give the Secretary of the Treasury the money necessary to put these bonds on the market and dispose of them. Of course, he ought not to have any more than is necessary. No doubt the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] overlooked the fact that we have offered an amendment in line 17, on page 7, of this bill, which says—

Or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not the gentleman think his amendment should have come in after the word "authorized"?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I think this will be all right.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not think the language, "Hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary," is the correct language.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Ohio is right about that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It should read:

And one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of certificates of indebtedness herein authorized, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated.

Mr. KITCHIN. It reads:

Is hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

It is the same thing.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, no; if the gentleman puts those words after the comma, they do not make good sense.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am not as good a grammarian as the gentleman is, but it strikes me that they could not use any more than is necessary.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman puts in——

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, do not filibuster now on this. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am only trying to help the gentleman's bill, and I trust my efforts will be successful.

Mr. ADAMSON. Let us not lose the war on account of a comma.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the gentleman ought to have it in the other place.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that we caused an isue of bonds during the Spanish-American War, and we issued $200,000,000 of those bonds. It cost one-fifth of 1 per cent of the amount issued, and at the rate it cost the Government at that time it would cost $10,000,000 to issue $5,000,000,000 of bonds, to say nothing of the $2,000,000,000 certificates of indebtedness in addition. The Government required the additional employment of a force of 600 employees.

Further than that, they only had to make one issue and one propaganda for the sale of the bonds. In this case they will have to advertise in every nook and corner of the United States to sell these $5,000,000,000 of bonds. If they could not sell them at the first propaganda, they would have to make possibly three or four efforts to do it, and they would have to advertise every time. In the Spanish-American War and in the sale of the Panama Canal bonds there was simply one effort, one advertisement, which was enough to take all that were issued. It would be impossible for the Treasury Department to sell all of the $5,000,000,000 of bonds and the $2,000,000,000 of certificates in one month or two months, and I do not think the Secretary of the Treasury can sell them in a year. It will cost much more to sell these bonds than it did under the Spanish-American War act or the Panama Canal act.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I think there was an amendment offered, and if not, there has been discussion and declarations in favor of the bonds being issued in as small denominations as $25. Now, if you are going to issue them in such small amounts the paper bill will be very large.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am glad the gentleman from Illinois has made that remark. I was coming to that. We will probably issue a very large sum in small denominations. If we do that, it will cost for the paper alone to issue a billion dollars in small denominations many times as much as it cost to issue the bonds under the Panama Canal act or the Spanish-American War act. Paper has greatly increased in price. After all, Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Treasury is honest and he is going to look out for the interests of the Government. He will not spend any more than is absolutely necessary, and he ought to be given enough money to float the bonds and sell them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will not develop the habit of attempting to create an impression that every time anyone attempts to discharge his duty here by restricting expenditures he is intimating that some member of the Cabinet is dishonest. I believe the best thing we can do for the men who are most honest is to be the most careful in the performance of our duty. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, we gave him no more and no less than is absolutely necessary to enable him to perform his duty, and that is all we ask for, and I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were 143 ayes and 72 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2762) to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

There was no demand for a separate vote, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. MANN. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 390, answered "present" 1, not voting 40, as follows:

YEAS—390.

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following general pairs:

Mr. CAREW with Mr. EDMONDS.

Mr. MAHER with Mr. FESS.

Mr. STEAGALL with Mr. FRANCIS.

Mr. FLYNN with Mr. NOLAN.

Mr. LUNN with Mr. BACON.

Mr. DALE of New York with Mr. DILLON.

Mr. SULLIVAN with Mr. NORTON.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina with Mr. HAUGEN.

Mr. DOUGHTON with Mr. SWIFT.

Mr. BURNETT with Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota.

Mr. WHALEY with Mr. GEORGE W. FAIRCHILD.

Mr. MARTIN of Illinois with Mr. COPLEY.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi with Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HULBERT with Mr. HAYES.

Mr. BRUCKNER with Mr. KREIDER.

Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. LONGWORTH.

Mr. NEELY with Mr. SMITH of Idaho.

Mr. GANDY with Mr. MORIN.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and he answered "Yea."

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make an inquiry concerning the propriety of marking up the pairs on a vote of this sort, where there have been no votes in the negative whatsoever, unless there has been some positive request to the contrary.

The SPEAKER. They are only general pairs, the pair clerk informs the Chair.

Mr. TILSON. Nevertheless it would appear that these men are one paired against the other, whereas the other Members of the House have voted all one way.

The SPEAKER. As a matter of fact, neither the Speaker nor the House has anything to do with the pairs. It is a kind of excrescence that has grown up on the body politic.

Mr. TILSON. Did the Members themselves have anything to do with arranging these pairs?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know, and it is none of his business.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the question was asked me, as everybody was voting for this bill, How about pairs? Members go away and ask to be paired on a bill. A number of such requests were made. It was not possible to pair Members on this bill for and against. I requested the pair clerks to put up general pairs only, which do not indicate how Members would vote on the bill and do not indicate that either of the gentlemen paired would vote against the bill, but which would give some excuse for their being absent.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. A number of gentlemen of the House are absent necessarily, because they were assigned to attend the funeral of a former colleague, and they are paired.

The SPEAKER. These pairs are general pairs.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I know that my colleagues, Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina and Mr. WHALEY, are both unavoidably absent.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I may say that I was asked by a large number of gentlemen, some of whom are absent on a funeral, some of whom are absent on account of illness, and for various other reasons, that they be paired in favor of the bill. I think every one is in favor of the bill. They can not be paired in favor of the bill with anyone who is against it, because there is no one who is against the bill.

The SPEAKER. How would it do for the gentleman to ask unanimous consent to cancel these pairs, so far as they go?

Mr. MANN. I think the pairs ought to show in the RECORD as evidence that Members were attending to business enough to endeavor to secure a pair. I wish to make the statement that all gentlemen on this side who are paired would have voted for the bill if they had been present.

Mr. KITCHIN. I can say the same thing for those on this side.

Mr. TALBOTT. Would it not be well to have it understood that when these gentlemen return they can ask unanimous consent to make the RECORD all right?

Mr. MANN. They can not be permitted to vote, however.

Mr. BORLAND. I think what the gentleman from North Carolina said is true of my colleague, Mr. BOOHER, who is away on a funeral. If he were here, he would vote for the bill.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I ask unanimous consent to state that my colleagues, Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina and Mr. WHALEY, both desired to vote for the bill, and would have done so if present.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I think I can state for this side, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] did for the other side, that all of the Democratic Members who are absent, if present would have voted for the bill. I know yesterday I told several gentleman who wanted to go out of the city or who had other business to attend to that we would probably not have a yea-and-nay vote on this question this afternoon.

Mr. LANGLEY. I know of two gentlemen who are away with that understanding.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the House will pardon me, I asked for the yeas and nays upon this bill, although I had originally expected not to do so. I asked for the yeas and nays because a number of the gentlemen in the House who for conscientious reasons had voted against the war resolution desired to have the yeas and nays in order that they might be recorded in favor of this bill on which we have just voted.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. NOLAN, is sick in bed, and sent word to me that he would vote "aye" if he were able to be here.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. MORIN, was suddenly called out of the city to-day. He was in favor of the bill and would have so voted had he been able to have been here.

Mr. LA GUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. FRANCIS, was suddenly called out of the city and sent word that if he were present he would vote "aye."

The SPEAKER. On this vote the ayes are 389, the noes none, present one, and the bill is unanimously passed. [Applause.]

On motion of Mr. KITCHIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. MARTIN of Illinois, is confined to his home by illness, and if present he would have voted for this bill.

HOUR OF MEETING ON MONDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 1 p. m. on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 1 o'clock next Monday. Is their objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand it is the expectation on Monday to do no other business than to take up the conference report on the deficiency bill and then adjourn either to Wednesday or Thursday.

Mr. KITCHIN. To either Wednesday or Thursday; that is our intention, depending upon the military bill.

Mr. MANN. I hope that when we meet on Monday this side of the House will be prepared to move the election of the balance of the members of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CONFERENCE REPORT—GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman presents a conference report the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed under the rule.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 14) making appropriations for the Military Academy, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 14, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will announce the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DENT, Mr. FIELDS, and Mr. KAHN.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leaves of absence were granted as follows:

To Mr. HULBERT, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. CALDWELL, for to-day, on account of important business.

AMENDING SECTION 10 OF CHAPTER 2 OF CRIMINAL CODE.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2893).

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2893) to amend section 10 of chapter 2 of the Criminal Code.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 10 of chapter 2 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 10. Whoever, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, enlists or enters himself, or hires or retains another person to enlist or enter himself, or to go beyond the limits or jurisdiction of the United States with intent to be enlisted or entered in the service of any foreign prince, State, colony, district, or people as a soldier or as a marine or seaman on board of any vessel of war, letter of marque, or privateer shall be fined not more than $1,000 and imprisoned not more than three years: Provided, That this section shall not apply to citizens or subjects of any country engaged in war with a country with which the United States is at war."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think it is due to the House to have some explanation made from the chairman of the committee as to what changes are made by the proposed bill in the section that is sought to be amended. I assume it is only the proviso that is new to the existing law?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to make a statement for the information of my friend and the House. As stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] the only new language is in the proviso which permits allies to send their recruiting officers into the United States for the purpose of recruiting among their own citizens and subjects. It is a very important measure and a very urgent one. I do not feel at liberty to give all the reasons for the passage of the bill. I think it will appeal to the membership of this House when they know the United States can not recruit these citizens and subjects of foreign countries, but if the allied powers send recruiting officers they can enlist many to go abroad and fight their countries' battles.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it proposed to authorize the representatives of foreign governments to come to this country and establish recruiting stations for the purpose of obtaining personnel for the various armed activities of those foreign governments?

Mr. WEBB. Among their own citizens and subjects. Permit them to do it of course. Permit them to recruit from their own citizens and subjects. And I will state to my friend, upon the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], in order to make it perfectly clear that no foreign government shall be permitted to recruit an American citizen, I propose to offer an amendment at the end of the bill which makes that clear.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the purport of that amendment?

Mr. WEBB. To make it unlawful for a foreign recruiting officer to recruit or enlist any American citizen. It confines his activities strictly to citizens of the allies.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman permit me to call his attention to the fact that this bill will authorize British subjects in the United States to enlist in the German Army?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think so, and can not think that it will be done even if it is possible.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I think if we are going to pass a law it ought to be a sure enough law.

Mr. WEBB. This is a "sure enough law," I will say to my friend.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If the gentleman will permit, the bill exempts from its operation all subjects of countries which are at war with countries with which we are at war. Therefore it leaves them entirely free to do whatever they will. All such subjects may enlist in any army they wish to enlist in. They may enlist, for illustration, to carry on a filibustering expedition against some country with which we are at peace. In other words, this law is repealed so far as it applies to the subjects of countries which are at war with any country with which we are at war. Now, that is the effect of the statute.

Mr. TEMPLE. Does the gentleman conceive that we would be idle if Germany would send recruiting officers over here to enlist soldiers?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will say to the gentleman that I stated that as an extreme case which would be likely. We do not want British subjects residing here enlisted for a filibustering expedition against Mexico, and under its terms that could be done.

Mr. MANN. It does not permit the German Government to send anybody here.

Mr. TEMPLE. This does not repeal all the laws we have on the subject. We have other laws that would forbid such matters as the gentleman refers to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman. A Canadian officer offers his services to the United States Government; the War Department has informed me that unless he is a citizen of the United States he can not be enlisted in the service of the United States. Does the gentleman understand that to be the law?

Mr. WEBB. That is a different question. This bill does not affect that matter.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But it leads up to what I wanted to ask. Does the gentleman know?

Mr. WEBB. I have not examined the law, but I presume it is a fact, if you have the information from the War Department.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If a citizen of the United States were to be enlisted under such a plan as this bill might permit of for a foreign service, would he cease then to be a citizen of the United States upon taking an obligation to serve a foreign country?

Mr. WEBB. This bill we are considering does not affect that proposition at all. It only affects citizens or subjects of the foreign governments that are fighting the same enemy that we are.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask this, in order to make it clear to myself, at least? Will this provision permit of foreign recruiting officers setting up recruiting stations in the United States to recruit aliens for foreign service?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; if the aliens are citizens or subjects of the allied countries.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. British aliens who are in the United States may be recruited in this way to go over and fight for Great Britain; a Frenchman may be recruited in this way to go back and fight for France?

Mr. WEBB. That is the idea. That is the object of the bill entirely.

Mr. HOWARD. Are these aliens recruited by these foreign governments in this country under the laws of their own country or under the laws of our country? For instance, in England they have a conscription law. If we were to pass this act, could the English recruiting officers come to the United States and conscript a subject of England?

Mr. WEBB. No. This is not conscription. This is recruiting, which is voluntary.

Mr. HOWARD. But I am talking about recruiting under our law and under their law. Is it a voluntary proposition?

Mr. WEBB. Absolutely.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield a minute?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman explain just what the distinction is, and to whom it is applicable, made by the use of the words "citizen or subject."

Mr. WEBB. Well, they are interchanging terms. A person living in the United States who is not naturalized is a foreigner, so far as we are concerned.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the distinction in this country between a citizen of a foreign country in this country and a subject of a foreign country?

Mr. GARD. A citizen relates to a republic and a subject relates to a monarchy.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, there are subjects in this country.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; I yield to my friend from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. I understand that this proviso added to this section has the effect of repealing the foreign-enlistment act, so far as it relates to citizens or subjects of countries at war with countries with which we are at war. If it only repeals it to that extent, I will ask the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary does it not automatically come to a close when we conclude peace?

Mr. WEBB. I should think so.

Mr. BORLAND. In other words, the operation of this repealing clause is only effective when we are at war with some foreign country?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; either now or in the future.

Mr. BORLAND. And in time of peace no recruiting of that kind could be done within our borders?

Mr. WEBB. Absolutely not; the act only applies in time of war.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. This law would exempt subjects of England from punishment for enlisting recruits. What is there to prevent the Mexican Government from enlisting an Englishman in the Mexican service?

Mr. WEBB. I did not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. LITTLE. I say this law would exempt an Englishman from any punishment for disobeying the permanent existing law. What is to prevent the Mexican Government from enlisting an Englishman or a Russian?

Mr. WEBB. Mexico is not at war with the same countries we are at war with.

Mr. LITTLE. But what is to prevent them from enlisting any man that is not to be punished by this law?

Mr. WEBB. The act only provides that an Englishman may enlist here in the service of a country engaged in war with a country with which we are at war and Mexico is not.

Mr. LITTLE. That leaves a Russian or a Frenchman free from its provisions. What is to prevent the Mexican Government from coming in and enlisting any of them in its army?

Mr. WEBB. If the gentleman will read the proviso carefully, I think he will understand.

Mr. MANN. The Mexican Government can not come here and enlist anybody.

Mr. LITTLE. What is there in the law to prevent? That is what I want to know.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] will pardon me, the existing act puts a penalty against two classes of persons: One against those who enlist for a foreign service under the government of a foreign country, and, second, those who engage in an attempt to enlist or employ the service of any other person, so that to-day no American and nobody in the United States subject to our jurisdiction has the right to enlist to serve under any foreign government, and nobody has the right to solicit or engage any person in the United States for service under a foreign government.

Now, this removes that restriction as to subjects of foreign governments who are engaged in war with a country with which we are engaged in war, so that if this provision goes through an Englishman or an Italian here could enlist now and promise to go to England or to Italy and join the English or Italian army without being subject to the present penalty. An Italian agent coming here could enlist any subject of any country outside of Germany to go and serve in the Italian Army. But a Mexican agent can not come here and solicit anybody's employment in the service of Mexico, because that penalty still applies to him.

Mr. LITTLE. An Italian can enlist in the Mexican Army here, can he not?

Mr. MANN. He can not be solicited to enlist in the Mexican Army here.

Mr. LITTLE. That is a very fine distinction.

Mr. TEMPLE. A recruiting agency of the Mexican Government can not be established here.

Mr. LITTLE. I think that could very easily be got by. I think it should be made clear.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from North Carolina, who is familiar with the bill, what this proviso really means. For instance, we have a great many people residing in the United States who are the subjects of the Austrian Government and some of the German Empire, and they are ready and they are willing to go back to fight the Government which has for many years oppressed them. I may say, for instance, that there might be in this country a thousand Bohemians who are ready to go back and fight against Austria. They are Austrian subjects, but under this bill and under this proviso they will not be permitted to go. Is that correct?

Mr. WEBB. They might probably join the American ranks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SABATH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have an answer from the gentleman.

Mr. WEBB. I do not think they could be recruited under this law, but there is nothing to keep them from going abroad to fight. However, they could not be recruited here, under this section.

Mr. SABATH. They can go?

Mr. WEBB. They can go, but they can not be recruited in the United States.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if there were any hearings had on the bill by the gentleman's committee?

Mr. WEBB. None at all.

Mr. RAKER. Was the bill reported by the gentleman's committee?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; unanimously.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman state about how many English subjects, aliens, will come under this bill?

Mr. WEBB. I will say to my friend from California that I made inquiry at the State Department to-day and at the Department of Justice, trying to get the number of English; but they will have to get the records in New York to find that out, and they can not tell yet.

Mr. RAKER. Is there any estimate of it?

Mr. WEBB. There are something like 220,000 Italians in this country.

Mr. RAKER. And how in regard to the French?

Mr. WEBB. Very few. Nearly all the French have gone back.

Mr. RAKER. How in regard to Russians?

Mr. WEBB. The Russians are estimated at from 150,000 to 200,000.

Mr. RAKER. How in regard to Japanese?

Mr. WEBB. I did not get the number of Japanese.

Mr. SABATH. Would the gentleman expect the Japanese to go?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, let us find out about this.

Mr. WEBB. I want to answer the gentleman's question. I will say further, I find there are something like 40,000 to 45,000 Roumanians in this country, a total of something like 400,000 people among whom these foreign recruiting officers could recruit, asking natives of the allied countries to go and fight for their country. There is nothing compulsory about it; but it permits them to get these boys, natives of their own countries, and I hope they may go and take the place of some of our own boys who might have to go.

Mr. RAKER. What is the urgent necessity for this legislation to-day?

Mr. WEBB. I will say that a message came to me from the President and from the Attorney General and others who are deeply interested in the cause which we are now espousing, saying that it is very important to put this bill through. I do not feel like saying anything further; but it is a very important measure, so considered by our Government.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman believes that there would be no detrimental effect occasioned by permitting the officers of a foreign country to come into this country and enlist men who are living here for service in the country to which they belong?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think so under the circumstances, because if we are going to enlist our own boys pretty soon, and probably conscript them, I see no objection to gentlemen from across the sea asking some of their own citizens to enlist to fight for their native country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This bill may have a very serious effect upon a very large part of our foreign population. We have invited these people here, in a way, to come to this country as a haven from oppression abroad. I want to ask whether the gentleman understands that this means that foreign army officers, coming from autocratic countries, are to be allowed to come into the United States to induce these men to enlist; and if so, whether they will have any power of compulsion to force them to do so?

Mr. WEBB. There is nothing compulsory at all about the bill. It is purely an enlistment bill; and if there was any compulsion in it, the word "conscription" would have been used. I for one would be opposed to giving any foreign power the right of conscription in this country, and it is not contemplated in this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. After they have enlisted or indicated their purpose to enlist, will they be compelled to go? Is there any force within the United States to compel them?

Mr. WEBB. It is entirely voluntary.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina a question.

The SPEAKER. Two gentlemen can not be heard at once. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] has been seeking recognition.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I want to ask the gentleman from North Carolina what he thinks about the effect upon some poor, ignorant laborer, not able to speak our language, who had come over here, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has just suggested, to find a haven of liberty from oppression, when he is confronted by an officer from one of the autocratic countries to which the gentleman alluded, an officer in uniform, who, in private conversation, in a language which an American can not understand, tells this laborer that he must go with him? What will the laborer say? He will go, will he not?

Mr. WEBB. I have no idea——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will that be voluntary? Is there not an opportunity for oppression unless there be some restriction thrown around the right of a foreign officer to come here and talk to poor people of that class?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think so. If some of the men of America are going to be conscripted, I think the people of these other countries ought to go if we are to go.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield to me for a question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. As the bill reads you would not exempt a Frenchman, because he is a citizen of a country that is at war with Germany, if he wanted to enlist in the German Army, because it will not apply to citizens of a country engaged in war with a country with which the United States is at war. Your bill is not directed to the fact that we want to exempt enlistment for service under a country that is engaged in war. It has nothing to do with that.

Mr. WEBB. I will say that it is certainly so intended.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Under the terms of the bill it would not exempt a Frenchman who wanted to serve in the German Army.

Mr. WEBB. He need not go at all. A French recruiting officer could not get him unless the Frenchman wanted to volunteer, and if he wanted to go into the German Army he would get out of the country the best way he could and go to Germany. No French officer would recruit him. There is no power to compel him to go with the French recruiting officer, even though he is asked to go and fight for his native country. Surely, if we are going to conscript our American boys to go and fight in Europe for the allies, natives of the allied countries living among us should be at least asked to go and do the same for their own countries.

Mr. TEMPLE. There was another point I would like to ask some information about, and in order to ask the question I must make a statement first. About two years ago the State Department published a statement concerning double citizenship. I believe that we have no naturalization treaty with Italy, and we have no naturalization treaty with Russia. Both of those countries claim their native-born subjects, even though they may be naturalized in a foreign country.

Mr. LANGLEY. They do not admit that there is any expatriation.

Mr. TEMPLE. You say it will be forbidden to a citizen of the United States to enlist in this country for service under a foreign Government; but if an Italian recruiting office is opened in this country, or if a Russian recruiting office is opened in this country, the recruiting officers of those countries will claim the men born in their countries, although they have been naturalized as American citizens. Would it not be well to take time to draft the bill in such a way as to avoid that difficulty, because the United States Government and the Russian Government, and the United States Government and the Italian Government, have never been able to agree with regard to a naturalization treaty, and the question of double citizenship might arise?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman think that any Italian or Russian recruiting officer is going to raise that question in this country?

Mr. TEMPLE. If a recruiting office has been opened and an Italian goes into it speaking the Italian language and professes to be an Italian and is accepted, the recruiting officer does not know that that Italian is a citizen of the United States, and yet that citizen of the United States incurs the penalty imposed upon him by our law.

Mr. MANN. The Italian agent or recruiting officer would incur the penalty.

Mr. TEMPLE. And the citizen would also incur the penalty.

Mr. MANN. That is what we want. There is no way of preventing that. All we can do is to provide the penalty, and the bill does that.

Mr. TEMPLE. But the question would arise in a dispute between this Government and the Government that enlisted him.

Mr. MANN. It might arise in Italy but not in the United States.

Mr. TEMPLE. It might give rise to diplomatic correspondence in regard to it.

Mr. MANN. Here is a penal provision against people who are American citizens. We maintain that they are American citizens when enlisted, and it makes no difference what Italy claims.

Mr. TEMPLE. The Government of the United States might demand his discharge and the Italian Government refuse to give him up on the ground that he is an Italian subject.

Mr. MANN. That has nothing to do with this penalty.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from North Carolina, who drew this bill, whether it was drawn on this side of the water or on the other side?

Mr. WEBB. Nine-tenths of the bill has been on the statute books for years and years. The only thing new about it is the proviso, and that was drawn by the Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I wanted to know whether the bill was drawn by Mr. Gregory or Spring-Rice. I want to ask if it will permit a recruiting officer to go into every alley and street and nook of every city, and how many enlistment officers will be permitted to come into the country?

Mr. WEBB. I can not tell the gentleman.

Mr. GALLIVAN. It is unlimited?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Is there not some danger that we would not be able to get a million fighting men; for some cities—not Boston—would be depleted?

Mr. LA GUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. LA GUARDIA. This provision is for voluntary enlistment?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. LA GUARDIA. What protection are you going to give the man who voluntarily enlists that when he gets over there he will not be imprisoned or shot as being a deserter, because Italy and France and nearly all the countries have conscription?

Mr. WEBB. My best advice would be to that man not to enlist; he had better stay here.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I object.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SIEGEL, by unanimous consent, was given leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Monday, April 16, 1917, at 1 o'clock p. m.

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 16, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in this place of greatest responsibility we voice again before Thee the prayers that have ascended from a thousand altars on the holy Sabbath day. We realize that this is the day of our national testing. Cheerfully we lay aside the ease and comfort of the blessed years that have gone by and assume our part and take our place in the ranks of those who struggle for the rights of humanity. We pray that out of the tragic events of our time there may come the finer and higher and purer qualities of character, that we may be fitted for the service that Thou dost require at our hands, and that we may be prepared for a speedy and glorious victory for the cause of right. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have here certain resolutions passed at a patriotic meeting held in Assembly Hall, Salt Lake City, April 10, by Americans of Scandinavian birth and extraction and residents of the State of Utah. I ask that the resolutions, or declarations as they are headed, be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Declarations.

Expressive of our sentiments and in harmony with the traditions and history of our race, we, as loyal Americans of Scandinavian birth or extraction, residents of the State of Utah, convened in mass meeting at the Assembly Hall in the city of Salt Lake, this 10th day of April, A. D. 1917, declare our firm loyalty and undivided allegiance to our adopted country, the United States of America; its flag, the Stars and Stripes; and to the President and Congress of these United States.

We love, revere, and appreciate the basic principles and guaranties of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness accorded us by the Constitution and reaffirm our belief in the divine doctrines of the Declaration of Independence that all men are created free and equal, and that the just powers of governments must be derived from the consent of the governed.

We indorse and approve the patriotic, humane, and Christian declarations of President Wilson in his message to Congress April 2, 1917, and the resolution adopted by the Senate and the House of Representatives confirming said message and declaring that a state of war exists, which has been forced upon us by the Imperial German Government by and through its numerous overt acts against the lives and property of American citizens in plain violation of international law and against the protests, peace, and dignity of the United States.

We have no enmity toward the German people but deplore and condemn the inhuman and tyrannical conduct of the Imperial militaristic German Government. We earnestly hope and pray that by the successful termination of this war it will be completely abolished and popular governments inaugurated throughout the civilized world.

Therefore in this crisis of our country we hereby solemnly adopt the following:

Resolutions.

Resolved, That we, citizens of Utah of Scandinavian origin, hereby solemnly pledge our loyal support to the President of the United States and to the governor of the State of Utah in obedience to any and every demand and requirement made of us for prosecuting this war, enforcing and defending the rights of our fellow citizens at home and abroad, and for maintaining the honor and integrity of our glorious Nation against any and all its enemies;

Resolved, That we aid and encourage the enlistment of all able-bodied men required for the Army and Navy, especially in the militia of the State of Utah, and the naturalization of all alien Scandinavians within our borders;

Resolved, That we increase our racial habits of industry, frugality, and economy, and produce and conserve every resource and product within our control, holding the same subject to the orders of the President and the governor for use in the prosecution of this war to a successful end;

Resolved further, That copies of these declarations and resolutions be presented to the President of the United States, the governor of the State of Utah, and our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. I present resolutions adopted at a mass meeting held at Salt Lake City, Utah. They are short, and I ask that they be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That while we deplore the entrance of America into the world war, we declare our willingness to serve humanity in these trying hours in any honorable way that will hasten the dawn of peace and the alleviation of suffering; that we urge upon the President and Congress the safeguarding of the sacred liberties of the Nation from censorship and conscription, believing democracy depends on the right of free speech and voluntary patriotism; and we urge men everywhere to suppress suspicions and hatreds and to unite, regardless of race, creed, or party, in a new movement to realize the common consciousness of the common human oneness of all men, out of which alone will come world peace.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented petitions of sundry citizens of Luling, Quanah, Forney, San Antonio, Houston, Belton, and Teague, all in the State of Texas, praying for compulsory military service, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Commercial Club of Stamford, Tex., remonstrating against compulsory military service, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Presbytery of Maumee, in convention at Defiance, Ohio, praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KELLOGG presented a petition of the Business Men's League of Albert Lea, Minn., praying for an appropriation for the construction and maintenance of a system of national highways, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, last Saturday night, in this city, the supreme board of directors of the Knights of Columbus met and passed resolutions of loyalty and patriotism. I am very glad to present the resolutions, which I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

The supreme board of directors of the Knights of Columbus, at a called meeting held this 14th day of April, 1917, in the city of Washington, realizing that the crisis confronting our country calls for the active cooperation and patriotic zeal of every true citizen, hereby reaffirms the devotion of 400,000 members of this order in this country to our Republic and its laws and pledges their continued and unconditional support of the President and the Congress of this Nation in their determination to protect its honor and its ideals of humanity and right.

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President and to the House of Representatives and to the Senate of the United States of America.

Mr. THOMPSON. I present petitions of the Clearing House Association of Lawrence, Kans.; the International Legal Fraternity of Phi Delta Phi, in province convention assembled at Kansas City, Mo.; and of sundry citizens of Hays, Kans., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petitions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEAR SIR: The following resolution was this day unanimously adopted by the Lawrence Clearing House Association:

Action taken by a mass meeting of 2,400 persons of Hays and vicinity, assembled in Sheridan Coliseum by proclamation of the mayor of Hays, George Philip, jr., patriotic day, Monday, April 9, 1917:

Resolutions adopted unanimously by a standing vote of everyone present.

Whereas the President of the United States has found it impossible for this Nation to remain neutral in the present great world struggle and at the same time be a leader of the democracy of the world, and has found it necessary to so state to the world with a profound sense of the solemn and even tragical character of the step and of the grave responsibilities which it involved; and

Whereas he did not hesitate in his obedience to what he deemed his constitutional duty and advised Congress to declare that the recent course of the Imperial German Government was in fact nothing less than a state of war against the people of the United States; and

Whereas the United States of America, in pursuance to this request of its President, has formally accepted the status of belligerent which was thus thrust upon it and is now taking those steps which Congress and the President deemed necessary to put the country into a more thorough state of defense; and

Whereas our President has stated very clearly that the people of the United States bear no ill will toward any people of the world, and that this war is not a quarrel with the German people, toward whom we have no feeling but one of sympathy and friendship, but against the imperialistic rulers of Germany, who in their disregard of international law in respect to the rights of neutral nations and acting on their own impulse without previous knowledge or approval of the people have provoked and waged this war; and

Whereas we have accepted the status of belligerent which the Congress and the President of the United States of America have thus declared: Be it therefore

Resolved, That the citizens of Hays and vicinity pledge their support to vindicate the principles of peace and of justice in the life of the world; and be it further

Resolved, That this mass meeting of the people of Hays and its vicinity, representing every walk of life, all nationalities, all parties, and all beliefs, unanimously pledge its unswerving loyalty to President Woodrow Wilson and the Congress of the United States, and without respect to blood or nationality stand before the world solidly as Americans; and be it further

Resolved, That we pledge ourselves collectively and singly to perform whatever service our State and Nation may call upon us to perform in this crisis; and be it further

Resolved, That we pledge ourselves collectively and singly to conserve the resources of our community and to eliminate waste wherever possible in public as well as in private life in order that the best interests of the entire United States may be thus served; and be it further

Resolved, That we pledge ourselves collectively and singly to do all within our power to increase the production of all food crops for man and beast in order to materially assist the Government in carrying out its plans; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to President Woodrow Wilson, Senator CHARLES CURTIS, Senator W. H. THOMPSON, Congressman J. R. CONNELLY, Gov. Arthur Capper, and be printed in the Ellis County News and the Hays Free Press.

(Prepared and signed by the committee appointed by the mayor of Hays, George Philip, jr.)

Mr. McKELLAR. I present a telegram embodying resolutions adopted at a mass meeting in the city of Memphis, Tenn., held on Saturday. I ask that they be read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

MEMPHIS, TENN., April 15, 1917.

Senator K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

Whereas in the wisdom of Providence and under the guidance of the President and the Congress of these United States expressing the will of the people this Nation has entered into a mighty world war; and

Whereas this is a moment for the solemn consecration of every man, woman, and child in the Nation to the cause of liberty and humanity; and

Whereas every physical, mental, and natural resource of the Nation and the people thereof should, in order to assure victory and peace, be placed at the disposition and disposal of the constituted authorities of the Government: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the people of Memphis, in mass meeting assembled, do hereby pledge to the President and to the Congress of these United States our supreme loyalty and consecration to the national cause; and be it further

Resolved, That we do urge upon the Congress of these United States the necessity of upholding the hands of the President by adopting an immediate system of selective universal military service that will call to the colors all classes and conditions of men, conserving their efforts along the lines to which they are best suited; and be it further

Resolved, That copy of these resolutions be wired to the President, to the President of the Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the Hon. K. D. MCKELLAR, Senator, and to the Hon. HUBERT FISHER, Member of Congress. It being our united wish that the chairman of this mass meeting, the Hon. T. C. Ashcroft, mayor of Memphis, express through this medium our pledge of loyalty and undying patriotism.

Respectfully transmitted.

Mr. McKELLAR. I present a number of telegrams and communications that I desire to have printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMPHIS, TENN., April 12, 1917.

Hon. K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

On the 2d instant you received a petition signed by myself and numerous other citizens opposing the establishment of compulsory universal military training and service, which will lead to the intrenchment of militarism in this country. I don't think that it is necessary for me to tell you what the true American thinks of conscription, especially since you have every means of knowing how much opposition is developing against this measure and the number of petitions you have received opposing militarism.

We must draw the conclusion that you are for the establishment of Prussian militarism in this country or you would have written declaring your stand; you are either for or against; there is no middle ground. The petition plainly states our views and sentiments and we don't want you to confuse the establishment of militarism, and Congress making provisions for the present state of war, to push the war to a successful issue. But for the President, the War College, and the National Defense League to foist conscription on the people is unthinkable in this Republic.

Yours, very truly,
H. B. TERRELL,
33 Pantalac Avenue.

PROVISIONAL VOLUNTEER REGIMENT,
Memphis, Tenn., April 12, 1917.

Senator K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: I hope you will support a bill to use volunteers for the following reasons:

First. The Government should accept the services of volunteer organizations which will be offered if given an opportunity to serve. There are probably about 500,000 or 600,000 men who have served in the Spanish War Volunteers or in the United States Regular Army. Of this number probably 200,000 to 300,000 would offer their services on the proper conditions. These volunteer regiments practically effect their organizations, which saves the Government large sums of money; and they can be put on a fighting basis much quicker than raw recruits, having already had years of service; and would only have to "brush up" a little and learn the revised regulations. The best of the old volunteer system should be taken and the worst discarded. They want to serve, for the war only, side by side with men they know and under officers they know to be qualified to lead them. Of this number there are thousands who are qualified as officers. Many of them have seen real service and are business men, and are really officers and leaders of men. The United States should avail itself of their services. Many of these men would not care to risk their lives under young boys as officers or under enlisted men from the Army who are made officers, but who are not leaders of men nor business men but for the most part are men who enlisted in the Army because they could earn $30 to $65 per month in the Army. These men are not home builders nor producers. Naturally, business men and wage earners will hesitate to risk their lives under such officers. But they will be ready to serve under men who are known to have capacity for leadership.

Second. Some of the enlisted men will make good officers—they should be used; but the large majority are not leaders or thinkers. Some of the volunteer officers will be failures, but the large majority are made officers because they are known to be leaders. Many of the West Point graduates are failures, but the large majority are good. There will be some mistakes made, but let's make as few as possible.

Third. The conscription plan is all right, but it should be put in effect after the volunteer shall have been accepted, and not let it appear to the world that Americans have to be conscripted. I submit it to any fair mind that a willing servant is better and more satisfactory than an unwilling one, and that a volunteer is far superior to a conscript.

Fourth. Col. Roosevelt has offered to lead an army in Europe, if necessary. He should be given the opportunity to do so for two good reasons: First. He is a great leader, in whom the men would have confidence and would carry the expedition through to a successful conclusion. And, secondly, he is a great statesman in whom the Nation has faith, and could be used as a special envoy to transact important State business with the other nations, as well as to lead an army. Few men, if any, are so well qualified for the dual position.

Fifth. When the war is over we want a court of nations to settle all disputes and practically disband the armies of the nations.

Finally, use all the volunteers that offer; then use conscripts. And when the war is over and peace guaranteed, send them all home to build up the country and their homes.

Your friend,

EDW. MCGOWAN.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., March 30, 1917.

Hon. K. D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to express my most hearty approval of the universal military service bill which has been discussed in the United States for many months.

In Chattanooga, as doubtless in every other city in the country, there are hundreds of young men who spend most of their time loafing around pool rooms and street corners, etc., whom I think would be very largely benefited by the training that this service would give them.

I am also sure that the young men of the country generally would be much benefited by this kind of training.

In addition, I am also sure that the country needs the reserve that this training would give.

My son took a month's training at Fort Oglethorpe Camp last summer and it did him a world of good.

I hope that such a bill will be speedily passed by Congress at its special session.

Respectfully,

J. FRED FERGER.

SEWANEE, TENN., March 29, 1917.

Senator K. D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The faculties of college of arts and of theological school of the University of the South, Sewanee, in joint session on March 28, 1917, passed the following resolutions, with instructions that they be transmitted by telegraph to President Wilson and to the Senators and Congressmen of the State of Tennessee:

"Resolved—

"First. That it is the judgment of this body that in view of present international condition we should have universal military service.

"Second. That in view of the situation now existing and the events which led up to it, and in the light of such data as are available to the public, it is the judgment of this body that Congress should declare for an aggressive form of war as soon the the administration considers that the internal situation makes this possible."

The first of these resolutions was passed by a unanimous vote, and the second by a unanimous vote, but with one member not voting.

Memphis, Tenn., April 9, 1917.

MY DEAR MC.: I did not have the pleasure of seeing you during your recent visit—not that I did not want to, but because I knew your time was taken up and fully occupied with matters of more importance to you than "gaping" with one of your fixed friends.

The war is on us, and I'm sorry it is a necessity. I have been in a war, and I know its horrors. But I am an American now, not a rebel. What I want particularly to mention to you for consideration is the age proposition. It seems they are fixing the first call from 19 to 25 years. From my observation in the four years I served I think this is a mistake. I think they should have more matured, physically, men at first—say, from 20 to 30 years. Younger men, not fully matured, do not stand the hardships so well, and I think more susceptible to sickness, and, in addition, more indifferent and reckless. I give you this to think over It is well enough to take the younger men and train them for future use.

I am feeling very much worried over the outlook. While hoping every success for the allies and ourselves, I think I see untold misery ahead.

With best wishes,

Your friend,

JAMES BEASLEY.

Resolution adopted by Portsmouth Lodge, No. 154, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, April 11, 1917.

Whereas the Congress of the United States has enacted and the President has approved a joint resolution declaring that a state of war exists between the Imperial German Government and the Government and people of the United States, and making provision to prosecute the same: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the members of Portsmouth Lodge, No. 154, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, hereby renew their allegiance to the President of the United States and all those in authority, pledge to the country their unqualified support of such measures as it may be necessary to enact in order to prosecute the war to a successful termination, and declare their intention to bear, without complaint, such burdens of the war as may come to them, to the end that there may be established throughout the world equal opportunity for all and a lasting peace with honor among all the peoples of the earth.

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Senators from Ohio, and the Representative in Congress from this congressional district.

Resolutions.

Whereas the Imperial German Government in the prosecution of the present conflict has waged a submarine warfare that has held as naught all restraints placed upon naval warfare by the well-settled principles of international law, sinking merchant vessels and passenger ships of all nations, belligerent and neutral, without warning and without concern for the fate of those aboard, and in spite of the oft-repeated friendly protests and solemn warnings of the United States Government has not only refused to desist from its unlawful course, but, throwing aside every restraint, has, in flagrant and defiant violation of all law and the rights of humanity, waged a ruthless war (on the high seas) against all nations; and

Whereas it has destroyed the property and taken the lives of our citizens whose legitimate business pursuits took them upon the high seas; and

Whereas the German Government has, through its accredited representatives to our Government and its secret agents, fomented strikes, created industrial unrest, destroyed property, attempted to interfere with our domestic affairs, and while holding diplomatic relations with our Government has plotted against it and endeavored to involve it in a war with Japan and Mexico; and

Whereas the conduct of the German Government for the two years past has been such that our national honor has been assailed and our citizens outraged: Now, therefore

We, the members of the chamber of commerce, representing the citizenship of Mount Vernon and Knox County, Ohio, do, this 4th day of April, 1917,

Resolved—

First. That the acts herein complained of are a menace not only to our free institutions of government, but to all mankind; and, realizing that our Government was, in the providence of God, called into being and took its separate station among the nations of the earth as the greatest exponent of the doctrine of human rights and human liberty, we now call upon the President and Congress to recognize the state of war that has been thrust upon us, a peace-loving people, by the Imperial German Government, and declare war upon it and bend every energy toward marshaling the resources of this Nation, industrial, financial, military, and naval, and prosecute the war to a successful conclusion, thereby securing the preservation of our liberties, the safeguarding of the rights of humanity, and the promotion of international justice. To this end and in this cause we pledge ourselves without reservation.

Second. That we commend the President of the United States for his untiring efforts to avoid the present crises; that we indorse his masterful message to Congress on April 2, 1917, and that we call upon all citizens to unitedly stand behind him and the administration in all measures that may be necessary for the defense and protection on land and sea of the rights and sovereignty of the United States, the rights of humanity, and the safeguarding of free institutions of government.

"Resolved, That we, 400 citizens of the United States, assembled at Hazeldell School, Cleveland, reiterate our heartfelt allegiance to the United States, and declare our full adherence to the program which the President has indicated for the prosecution of this war, including the adoption of some form of comprehensive and uniform military service, so adjusted that the duties and privileges of citizenship may be shared alike by us all."

Respectfully submitted.

Resolution.

Whereas the Congress of the United States has declared war upon the Imperial German Government: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Council of the City of Zanesville, State of Ohio, That we do hereby concur in and approve all of the statements contained in the message of our President to the Congress; that we hereby approve of the passage by our Congress of the resolution declaring that a state of war exists with the Imperial German Government.

Resolved, further, That the city of Zanesville stands ready to do its full share in preparation for the impending struggle. When the call comes to purchase the war bonds of the Government this city will not deny the call; when there is issued the call to arms, that call will be hearkened to by the flower of our citizenship. In all things necessary to the successful prosecution of the war we do highly resolve to pledge, and do hereby pledge, our unswerving loyalty and fidelity.

Resolved, further, That it is our earnest prayer and fervent hope that in the conflict of arms this Government, under the guidance of God, shall prevail; that a righteous victory may be nobly won; and, finally, that out of this great struggle a substantial and permanent peace may be secured to all the peoples of the earth.

Clerk of Council.
W. H. WEBSTER,

Resolutions adopted by a patriotic mass meeting of citizens of North Olmsted, Ohio, April 11, 1917.

We, the citizens of North Olmsted, Ohio, in mass meeting assembled to consider our patriotic duty in the crisis time in which the Nation finds itself, hereby adopt the following resolutions:

"Whereas the German Government, by its inhuman and illegal policies and practices on land and sea, has proclaimed itself an outlaw among nations; and by waging relentless and ruthless submarine warfare against neutral as well as belligerent nations, has wantonly taken many American lives, along with American property, which it has destroyed; and by this means, and by the operation of a secret spy system conducted (according to President Wilson) by accredited German officials in this Nation, it has been waging persistent and continuous warfare against this Nation: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we heartily indorse the decision of our President and the Congress of the United States, that the day has come when neutrality on the part of our Nation is no longer possible, nor under the circumstances desirable; but faithfulness to our historic principles as a free people requires us to put right and justice before peace, and to hold liberty and the rights of humanity beyond all price, to be maintained even by the terrible instrument of war; and be it further

"Resolved, That we pledge the President of the United States our united and unqualified support in this crisis which has been thrust upon the Nation, in spite of his supreme tact, moderation, and patience. We assure him of our confidence in his high-minded leadership, and earnestly admonish our Representative and Senators in Congress to accord to him the undivided support which he so sorely needs, and which must be given him if the Nation is not to play a dishonorable part in the struggle into which we are now entering. We hereby pledge ourselves to every possible support, with full recognition of the sacrifice that may be required of us, personally, in the giving of service, of life, and of resources; and be it further

"Resolved, That neither the spirit and intent of these resolutions, nor the war to be waged by our Government against the German Government, implies the slightest unfriendliness toward the people of Germany, much less toward our friends and fellow citizens of German birth or descent. We earnestly pray them to join with our Nation in ridding the race of the monster that has plunged the world into a sea of blood, that never again may human liberty be threatened as it is to-day."

We solemnly take this action in the sight of God, believing that only thus can we protect those ideals which he has implanted within us, and which we hold as dearer than life.

Resolutions adopted by Scio Lodge of Independent Order of Odd Fellows at their regular meeting, April 7, 1917, at Scio, Ohio.

Be it resolved by Scio Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, No. 596, That we heartily concur with the Congress of the United States of America in declaring that a state of war exists between our country and Germany; that we reconsecrate ourselves to our common country, and pledge our support and loyalty to every effort that may be made to insure the successful issue of our arms, and to secure for us a lasting, honorable peace, and that we mail copies hereof to the Hon. ATLEE POMERENE, Hon. WARREN G. HARDING, and the Hon. DAVID A. HOLLINGSWORTH, at Washington, D. C., showing our appreciation for their votes.

The following resolutions were adopted at a joint meeting of the central and executive committees of Butler County:

Resolutions.

We, the joint Democratic central and executive committees of Butler County,

Declare and resolve—

First. We uphold and approve the action by President Wilson and Congress and the entire power of our Nation in upholding the dignity and integrity of the United States as a sovereign power whose paramount obligation is to protect American rights and the rights of humanity, and to promote international justice, liberty, and democracy; therefore we pledge ourselves and our party to support the President of the United States and the national administration in whatever steps may be necessary to these ends.

Second. We heartily indorse and approve of the ringing declaration of American rights uttered by our President to Congress on the 2d day of April, 1917. That we intend, with all the resources at our command, to stand firmly behind and support the President and Congress, our soldiers, and our sailors in all that they may do to uphold in every part of the world the flag of freedom and the full right of all Americans on land or on sea.

Third. We especially indorse the noble statement of the principles and purposes of our Nation by our President when he said:

"We have no quarrel with the German people. We have no feeling toward them but one of sympathy and friendship. It was not upon their impulse that their Government acted in entering this war. It was not with their previous knowledge or approval."

The people will thank him for this expression of friendship which the good citizen feels for his brother American of German ancestry.

Fourth. We cordially indorse and approve the course in Congress of Representative WARREN GARD, of the third Ohio district, and Senator ATLEE POMERENE, United States Senator from Ohio, for their militant Americanism in backing up by voice and vote the cause of our President.

Fifth. We declare ourselves in favor of universal military service as the only just, democratic, and efficient means of national defense.

Sixth. That immediate steps should be taken to mobilize the industrial, financial, military, and naval resources and the man power of the Nation effectively to defend upon both sea and land the rights and sovereignty of the United States, the rights of humanity, and the principles of free and democratic government. And this be our motto:

"In God is our trust."
And the Star-Spangled Banner in triumph shall wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.

The position of the Christian Church of Cincinnati and vicinity with regard to the present national crisis.

Whereas the President of the United States has, "with a profound sense of the solemn and even tragical character of the step" he was taking, declared a state of war to exist between Germany and the United States, and

Whereas there is much confusion in the minds of many as to the Christian ethics of war and the relation of the Christian Church thereto the Federation of Churches of Cincinnati and vicinity desires to give expression to what it believes is the mind of the spirit within its members in relation to the great crisis confronting the Nation.

We must remind ourselves that there are inevitable differences of conviction and judgment among equally good and patriotic men, and it is not to be expected that there will be unanimity of feeling as to the righteousness of this war. We have no desire to defend one or to deplore another set of honest convictions. We are chiefly concerned that we shall maintain the Christian spirit of love and brotherliness in the presence of differences of judgment and of interpretation of the mind of Christ, our common Lord. As Christians we can not but lament the necessity for war. As a method of determining the course of history, it carries us back to the days before civilization dawned, to the method of the jungle; in its appeal to physical force rather than to moral suasion, enlightened reason and spiritual idealism it is subversive of the fundamental principles of the Christian religion. Christianity seeks to win men by love; its ends are constructive and not destructive; its method is self-sacrifice. Even in the time of war, and however strongly convinced of the inevitableness of the present situation, the Christian Church will continue to bear witness to its high hope of the coming of a day of the Lord when men shall learn and resort to war no more.

But we are in the dilemma of the great prophet statesman of Israel who first uttered the clear hope of a day of universal peace, who in his messages to his people alternated visions of the ideal with the fearful realities which surrounded him in his nation's life. The Christian ideal can be realized only by slow progress, and to admit that we have not yet progressed to the realization of the ideal is not to be disloyal to it or to deny its desirability. The sad fact confronting us is that our Lord Christ has not yet come in triumph into the political kingdom of this world. Wrong and injustice and oppression must still be dealt with in individuals and in nations. The State must punish its individual criminals. We would that there were no criminals. And if we admit that fact, must we not allow a nation to resist by physical force a criminal Government, which attempts to inflict violence and injustice upon it? We would that there were no criminal nation. And so the time unhappily has not yet come when physical force, even from the practical Christian viewpoint, can be replaced wholly by the moral and spiritual appeal.

We may take courage in that the Christian ideal is so far realized that a war of offense is unqualifiedly condemned. And while perhaps no war is to be justified from the standpoint of the absolute Christian ideal, one can not read with an informed and unbiased mind President Wilson's message to Congress without feeling satisfied beyond the shadow of a doubt that from the standpoint of a Christian morality relative to the stage of our present human development this Nation's course with reference to the German Government is completely justified. As Christians, therefore, with the vision of peace in a world at war under the burden of the provocations of the Nation, and with a realization of the necessity to defend our liberties and to resist intolerable crimes against God and man, we can not, we dare not condemn this war, much as we love peace and pray for its universal reign. Indeed, if we catch the spirit of the splendid idealism of the President's message, and feel anything of his sincerity in his interpretation of the high spirit and the unselfish purpose of the Nation in meeting with the challenge of the German Government without rancor and without vengeance, we feel assured not only that our cause is just, but that it is Christian in aim and motive. Without hypocrisy or self-delusion, we may in an exalted Christian spirit of sacrifice accept the burden the Nation lays upon us in the defense of honor and freedom, and in the promotion of the principles of democracy and of permanent peace throughout the world.

We would therefore urge upon the members of our churches every possible cooperation with the Government, in promoting the efficiency of its war measures, in lending aid to soldiers and sailors through the work of the Red Cross Society, in promoting economic welfare by the cultivation of vegetable gardens, and in whatever other way appeal may be made or opportunity offered. We recommend that rooms in church buildings and parish houses be placed at the disposal of communities and groups of people who may desire to meet together for united effort of whatever kind. And above all, we urge that all our work and plans be consecrated by a spirit of deep seriousness and with the sense of grave responsibility as to all that is involved in the war, and that to this end special meetings for prayer, as well as for work, be held, so that we may be saved from bitterness, hatred, and the spirit of revenge and from everything unworthy of the high motives and aims to which the war is undertaken, and that we may unite our petitions to Almighty God "that, overruling the counsel of men, setting straight the things they can not govern or alter, taking pity on the nations now in the throes of conflict, in His mercy and goodness, showing a way where man can see none, He may vouchsafe His children healing peace again and restore once more that concord among men and nations without which there can be neither happiness nor true friendship, nor any wholesome fruit of toil or thought in the world, praying also to this end that He forgive us our sins, our ignorance of His holy will, our willfulness and many errors and lead us in paths of obedience to places of vision and to thoughts and counsels that purge and make wise.

THE TWENTIETH WARD WILSON CLUB,
Cleveland, April 13, 1917.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I beg to inclose herewith a copy of a resolution adopted unanimously at a meeting of the Twentieth Ward Wilson Club last evening.

Respectfully, yours, KEITH LAWRENCE.

Resolution.

Be it resolved by the Twentieth Ward Wilson Club in meeting assembled, on April 12, 1917, at Cleveland, That the members have and hereby express their explicit confidence in the President of the United States and approve unqualifiedly and indorse his every word and action in this great crisis of a Nation united and unafraid; and be it further

Resolved, That the members feel that it is fortunate there is in the Cabinet a Secretary of War who is so fitted by experience and ability for the task of training and equipping the Nation's manhood and developing its resources that it is rendered certain that right and justice will prevail and that democratic institutions will succeed autocracies throughout all the world; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary be instructed to transmit a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, the Senators from Ohio, and the Congressmen from Cleveland.

Resolutions adopted at mass meeting of citizens April 9, 1917.

Whereas the President and the Congress of the United States of America, after mature deliberation, have declared a state of war in defense of the institutions of our country; and

Whereas the President of the United States and the representatives of the people in Congress assembled have from time to time exercised caution and forbearance and, we firmly believe, have done their utmost to avoid a conflict of arms, and heretofore served notice to the world that we stood ready to proffer our resources toward the establishment of peace; and

Whereas the welfare and security of our very institutions of Government, of industry, and commerce and the future security of our cherished land of liberty is threatened by the violation of the laws of nations and of the humane considerations which are of the vital and fundamental bulwarks of our national life and principle, bringing upon us the serious condition of choice between national dishonor and decay or the defense of this home of this people, by the people, and for the people: Therefore the citizens of Mansfield and the surrounding community, in mass meeting assembled, "with malice toward none and charity for all, but with firmness in the right," do hereby

First. That as loyal Americans we indorse the action of our President and the Congress in severing relations with the Imperial Government of Germany and in declaring a state of war in defense of and to uphold the rights of our common country.

Second. That we pledge our hearty support to the President, the Congress, and all those in authority in the affairs of our Government in every act to protect the safety of our Nation and to further the cause of freedom and democracy throughout the world.

Third. That we believe the time is opportune when law shall require all citizens to serve alike to the call of country, and therefore urge that Congress immediately enact into statute the proposed measure providing for universal training and service to the country, and believe this to be the most just and efficient democratic method of national defense.

Fourth. That we urge Congress without undue delay to equip our existing troops and all troops to be raised with most modern appliances, to the end that our soldiers and sailors may have the means to render the service they may be called upon to do and shall be in preparedness to keep true the traditions of the American soldier, second to none in the world.

Fifth. That a committee, of which the presiding officer of this meeting shall be a member, be appointed by the chair to place these resolutions before the President of the United States and the proper committees of Congress and to urge the adoption of the policies declared therein.

G. W. PFEIFER, Secretary.

Adopted at Mansfield, Ohio, April 9, 1917.

BRYAN, OHIO, April 10, 1917.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I herewith inclose you two resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of the citizens of Bryan and county held at the opera house last night. These may be of value to you in arriving at a consensus of opinion of your State. Men and money must be provided, and war talk that does not arrive at anything definite probably is not much aid to you.

Very truly, R. L. STARR.

Resolved, That we recommend to the President and to Congress the passage and approval of a law that will provide for the payment of all of the expenses of the preparation and prosecution of the war with Germany by an income tax graduated from small to large incomes in increasing proportions.

We affirm that as men shall be compelled to give their lives and subject their bodies to death and suffering in order that the rights of commerce and travel on the high seas shall be free and in order that the rights of America shall be maintained, therefore it is fit and proper that men should be compelled to give their money for the vindication of these rights and privileges.

We are opposed to a Government sale of bonds to provide money for carrying on this war, and thus make of it an investment for money.

Resolved, That we recommend to the President and to Congress the passage and approval of a compulsory military-service law, making no exemptions or exceptions in favor of marriage or religion. We affirm the principle that the rights and benefits of citizenship carry with it the duties and obligations of defense. Therefore let no man hide behind the skirts of his wife or the prejudices of his religion and thus escape military service.

Mr. WALSH. I send to the desk a copy of resolutions adopted at a mass meetings at Butte, Mont., presided over by a former Member of this body, Hon. Lee Mantle. I ask that the resolutions be read.

There being no objection, the resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of the citizens of Butte, Mont., April 7, 1917.

Whereas the Imperial German Government has by its inhuman action and in open defiance of the laws of humanity as well as the law of nations brought about a condition as intolerable to this Nation as any that has preceded a previous war; and

Whereas the Government of the United States in keeping with the spirit of our fathers did patiently seek by all honorable means to avoid conflict with the Empire of Germany; and

Whereas the said German Nation did wage war upon the United States of America by sinking our vessels and murdering our citizens; and

Whereas Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, did ask that the Congress of the United States recognize that a state of war existed between our beloved Nation and the Imperial German Government; and

Whereas the patriotic Congress of the United States did respond by declaring that a state of war existed, as aforesaid, and did give unto the wise and patriotic President of the United States full power and authority to call upon the armed forces of the United States to tne end that the said war be brought to a successful conclusion: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the citizens of Silver Bow County, State of Montana, in mass meeting assembled do hereby commend the actions of our President and of our Congress in recognizing that a state of war existed between this free Nation and the Imperial German Government; and be it further

Resolved, That we, and each of us, do hereby pledge our individual and collective support to the President of the United States in assisting him to uphold the honor and the dignity of the United States of America in its battle for humanity against a barbaric and unprecedented campaign of butchery that has been and is being waged by the war-mad lord of Hohenzollern; and be it further

Resolved, That we pledge our lives and our world possessions to our Nation to the end that mankind be served for permanent betterment.

LEE MANTLE, Chairman.

Mr. MYERS. I present a patriotic resolution adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of Red Lodge, Mont., which has my hearty approval. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD with the names of the signers.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions by the citizens of Red Lodge at a mass meeting called by the mayor, held on April 6, 1917.

Whereas the Congress of the United States has formally declared that a state of war exists between this country and Germany, thereby officially noticing a condition that has existed in effect for the last two months; and

Whereas the Imperial German Government has openly waged war against our people and our Government by many acts of depredation and lawlessness, and by her unscrupulous conduct has sought not only to disregard the rights of American citizens to travel the highways of the world, but has utterly disregarded the common dictates of humanity by the ruthless destruction of American lives, the only offense the owners of which have committed was to refuse to abide by her arbitrary, unnecessary, and tyrannical edict; and

Whereas the Imperial German Government has for a long time maintained in this country a system of espionage and has conceived and fostered plots, intrigues, and conspiracies against our industries, our Government, and our people, which act in itself constitutes an act of war; and

Whereas the situation that now confronts this country is one which will require, not only all of our resources but the active, enthusiastic, and whole-hearted support of all of our people, our industries, and our vast wealth: Be it

Resolved by the citizens of Red Lodge, in mass meeting assembled, That we do enthusiastically, and unreservedly pledge our whole-souled indorsement and support to the Government of the United States; that we approve the action of Congress in formally declaring the existence of a state of war; that we hereby pledge ourselves to uphold the hands of that noble patriot and statesmen, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, and commend his stupendous efforts to avoid the unfortunate situation which now confronts this Government; and that we further pledge the active cooperation and earnest support of whatever further measures shall be necessary to insure a victory, a permanent, and a lasting peace; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to our congressional delegation for presentation by them to the proper authorities of the Government; that another copy be forwarded to Gov. Sam V. Stewart, and that a copy be presented to the city council to be spread upon the minutes of the city council.

I am directed to inform you that at a mass meeting of the members of the Missoula Chamber of Commerce and citizens of Missoula the following resolution was passed unanimously:

"That we favor the policy of selective conscription for active military service rather than the undemocratic volunteer policy, under which one patriot shoulders the shirked military duties and dangers of other citizens who are less patriotic."

I beg to inform you that the Missoula Woman's Club also passed a resolution for selective conscription, but three dissenting.

Hon. J. HAMILTON LEWIS,
Washington, D. C.:

Whereas one of the results following the ending of the world war, which has rocked Europe from center to center, will be the consideration of terms of peace; and

Whereas in the making of such terms of peace by the victors and the vanquished, the consideration of the rights and wrongs of the weaker nations must play a great part.

President Wilson has wisely said: "No peace can last or ought to last which does not recognize and accept the principle that governments derive all their just powers from the consent of the governed. No nation should seek to extend its policy over any other nation or people, but every nation should be left free to determine its own policy, its own development unhindered, unthreatened, unafraid, the little along with the great and powerful."

In speaking thus President Wilson has appealed to the conscience of the world. Will his appeal find lodgment in the peace conference which must soon settle the peace of the world?

If civilization is to be saved and Christianity is to be preserved, then the rights and wrongs of the weaker nations must be considered in the terms of peace.

If Poland is to emerge from its century of misrule as a consequence of this peace settlement, and the tragedies of Belgium and other smaller nations are to be taken into account and settled at the peace conference, what of Ireland, which for seven centuries has been misruled, devastated, and almost destroyed by the hand of oppression?

Resolved, therefore, That we demand that the voice of Ireland be heard and answered in this peace conference, and that Ireland receive back its autonomy among the nations, which she lost seven centuries ago.

Resolved, That the time has come when every country, great or small, should enjoy the fullest measure of freedom.

When Russia, the nation of slavery has successfully broken manacles that enslaved its people, deposed monarchy, dethroned czardom, and established a republican form of government on the ruins of autocracy, is it not time that the people of Ireland emerged from their centuries of misrule and took their place among the nations of the earth, vested with the power to govern themselves, and left free to determine their own policies, their own development, unhindered, unthreatened, unafraid?

Be it further resolved, That the United Irish Societies of Chicago and Cook County appeal to the Federal Congress to demand that Ireland, as one of the conditions of the peace settlement, be given their autonomy, and to take their place among the nations.

Be it further resolved, That copies of the foregoing resolutions be sent the Senators and Representatives at Washington, requesting them to take favorable action thereon.

Whereas a system of universal military training will not only prepare the citizens of this Nation for efficient service in the event of war, but when properly administered will promote the beneficial physical development of those subject to such training and will instill in the citizens of our country a sense of democracy, patriotism, discipline, and responsibility to duty; and

Whereas the want or lack of such a system of universal military training may result in disaster to our country: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the City Council of the city of Chicago is in accord with and favors the principle of universal military training and requests the two United States Senators from the State of Illinois and the Members of Congress from the districts in whole or in part within the city of Chicago to employ every effort to secure the enactment by Congress of a law establishing in the United States of America a system of universal and compulsory military training, and that the city clerk be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the public officials herein referred to.

[SEAL.] JOSEPH SIMAN, City Clerk.

Mr. KING. I desire to present and ask to have read a set of resolutions adopted by a large number of German and Austrian residents of the State of Utah, and also a letter from the governor of the State of Utah to the President of the United States accompanying the resolution. I ask to have the resolutions and letter read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATE OF UTAH,
EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Salt Lake City, March 30, 1917.

Hon. WOODROW WILSON,
President of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR PRESIDENT: I have the honor to transmit herewith, through the courtesy of Senator WILLIAM H. KING, resolutions which were unanimously adopted at a largely attended meeting of American citizens of German and Austrian birth or extraction, which I called and at which I had the honor to be the presiding officer.

My personal observations lead me to the belief that these resolutions correctly interpret the attitude of practically every American citizen of this State of German or Austrian birth or extraction.

Respectfully,

SIMON BAMBERGER, Governor.

Resolutions.

As loyal American citizens of German or Austrian birth or extraction, assembled in mass meeting at the Auditorium, in Salt Lake, this 29th day of March, 1917, we have met to reaffirm our allegiance to the American Flag and the American Government;

While, with every other good citizen, we deplore the state of war which is devastating and depopulating Europe, and deprecate any necessity which may force this country to participate in that war, we unreservedly pledge our support to the United States Government in such an emergency. Should war be declared against any foreign power or potentate for the protection of American rights and lives, we hereby

Resolve, To do our part as citizens of the Republic, whose liberty and opportunities we have enjoyed and whose hospitality has sheltered us when we sought refuge from oppression and injustice in other lands; and we further

Resolve, That we neither owe nor consider any higher national allegiance or obligation than that which we hereby acknowledge to the United States; and we further

Resolve, To expose and defeat, by every means within our power, any and every effort made either secretly or openly by citizens or foreigners, to embarrass, hinder, injure, or betray this Government, its officials, its Army or Navy, in carrying on war against any foreign foe whatsoever; and we further

Resolve, That we stand ready and willing to do our duty as citizens in war as in peace, and to fight, if need be, for the defense of American rights and the glory of the American Flag; and we

Resolve, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded by the governor of this State to the President of this Republic as a pledge of support from loyal citizens of Utah, whose ties of birth, blood, and recollection are not strong enough to hold against the bonds of duty, gratitude, and patriotism which bind us to the land of our adoption.

Mr. KING. I send to the desk a letter from Hon. I. C. Thoresen, of Salt Lake City, and a copy of resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Scandinavians, residents in the State of Utah, and ask that they be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to my colleague that I have already presented a similar set of resolutions which he now sends to the desk, and they can not be ordered printed in the RECORD a second time.

Mr. KING. I was not aware that my colleague had previously offered these resolutions, and I will therefore withdraw them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be withdrawn.

Mr. KING. I send to the desk and ask to have printed in the RECORD two letters from citizens of Utah. They are expressive of the same views contained in numerous letters which I have received in favor of the military bill which is to be submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. I ask that these letters be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, April 11, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. KING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR KING: I am taking the liberty of writing you on a subject in which I am deeply interested.

I believe that the volunteer system is unjust and undemocratic, and that our Army and Navy should be filled up in the present crisis on the plan of universal and obligatory liability for service. I urge you to do all in your power to gain the immediate enactment of an adequate bill for compulsory universal military training.

Very respectfully, yours, PAUL F. KEYSER.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, April 3, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. KING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR KING: I wish again to inflict myself upon you. Now, that the President very properly advocates universal military training, I hope you will use every effort with the President and otherwise to prevent the raising of regiments or divisions by the volunteer system, whether the offers to do so come from ex-President Roosevelt or from any other person. The principle is the thing, and no stronger argument could be placed at the command of the opponents of universal military training than a partial recognition or acceptance by our Government of the volunteer system. The men who would volunteer can better serve their country by acting as officers or instructors of the men who are selected under the universal system.

Very respectfully, WM. M. BRADLEY.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN presented petitions of sundry citizens of Oregon praying for the enactment of legislation to agricultural preparedness, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Portland, Oreg., praying for prohibition in military camps, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented petitions of the Harvard Club, of Spokane, the Home Guard, of Tacoma, and of Lodge No. 174, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, of Tacoma, all in the State of Washington, praying for compulsory military training, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Bellingham, Wash., praying for compulsory military service, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Dr. R. S. Gregory, of Newport, Wash., praying for the passage of the so-called national colonization bill and the industrial army bill, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. KNOX. I presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
FILE OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Concurrent resolution 11. (Mr. Hecht, in place, March 26, 1917.)

Whereas the subject of universal military training has been and will be presented to the Congress of the United States; and

Whereas there should be enacted into law a universal military training bill; now therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (if the senate concurs), That we earnestly indorse the principle of universal military training and urge upon the Members of Congress from the State of Pennsylvania to aid in the enactment of such a universal military training law as will now and hereafter provide for the common defense, promote and maintain the general welfare, safety, and happiness of all the people and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution, together with the action thereon, be sent to each Member in the Congress of the United States from the State of Pennsylvania.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of a resolution passed in the house of representatives on April 2, 1917, and concurred in by the senate on April 3, 1917.

THOMAS H. GARVIN,
Chief Clerk House of Representatives.

Mr. KNOX presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the extension of the Federal War Risk Insurance Bureau until after the close of the present war, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, pledging support to the President, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the congregation of the First Norwegian-Danish Methodist Episcopal Church, of Canby, Minn., remonstrating against the further use of foodstuffs for alcoholic beverages owing to the unusual demand, caused by the international crisis, of foodstuffs, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Two Harbors, Minn., praying that a post-office building be erected in that city, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present a telegram in the form of a memorial, signed by the president of Dartmouth College, Hanover, N. H., and 60 other officers and members of the faculty of that institution, protesting against the present system of enlistment and in favor of the method proposed by the President of the United States. I ask that the telegram be printed in the RECORD without the signatures.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HANOVER, N. H., April 14, 1917.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned officers and members of the faculty of Dartmouth College, wish respectfully to make record of our convictions that a policy of relying upon volunteer enlistments for prosecution of the war will result in an entirely disproportionate assumption of the earliest burdens and risks of war by the youth of greatest initiative and maximum worth throughout the country, thus creating a dearth of men of such characteristics needful for successive levies that the Government is altogether likely to be obliged to make. We believe this to be unwise in theory and dangerous in practice. We subscribe ourselves as believers in the principle of universal service urged by President Wilson, and as being desirous of having this principle enacted into law.

ERNEST MARTIN HOPKINS, President
(And others).

Mr. PENROSE. I present a petition of the Philadelphia (Pa.) Board of Trade, favoring the immediate adoption of a system of universal military training, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PHILADELPHIA BOARD OF TRADE,
Bourse Building, Philadelphia, April 9, 1917.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your memorialist, the Philadelphia Board of Trade, respectfully urges the immediate adoption of a system of universal military training for the United States.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

PHILADELPHIA BOARD OF TRADE,
[SEAL.] WM. M. COATES, President.
Attest:

W. R. TUCKER, Secretary.

In support of the foregoing request the following summary of reasons is submitted:

ARGUMENT.

Our country is engaging in a war the ultimate results of which no man can with assurance predict. The fact that it is not of our seeking, that it is forced upon us in spite of the exercise of the utmost forbearance, is conclusive that more than a desire for peace is necessary to safeguard our institutions and the lives and well being of the hundred millions of our people.

This war finds us not only unprepared (our national pursuits and temperaments will never lend themselves to an instant readiness for hostilities), it finds the whole people so unversed in the rudiments of national defense that very many months, perhaps a year or more, must elapse before anything approaching a reasonable condition of safety can be expected. Only the accident of favoring conditions saves us from national humiliation or disaster. A system which will at once meet the present crisis and prevent the recurrence of such a condition is urgently needed.

The war may not only lead to situations which will test to the utmost our capacity and endurance—it is certain to lead in the end to extensive readjustments between the nations, to new alignments of powers, to new methods of international competition. During the whole period of such readjustment there will exist a special need for preparedness, for a condition of readiness to meet emergencies. To adequately provide for the responsibilities which can be now reasonably foreseen a system must be adopted which will make constantly available in case of need the great unorganized power of the country. This can not be accomplished unless the oncoming generations are given a sufficient education in the fundamentals of military training.

The proposal does not involve the maintenance of a large standing army, it obviates the necessity for such an army, and is the measure which democracy must of necessity take if it would avoid the dangers of militarism and at the same time preserve democratic institutions from the constant threat of autocracy, on the one hand, or disorganization on the other.

The proposal does not create a military caste, it gives sufficient education and training to the people generally to fight in defense of democracy if the necessity arise.

The proposal will cure the manifest unfairness and fatal weakness of our present militia system, which is based on an unequal participation of individuals and States in matters affecting the common defense. The present system results not in the formation of a coordinated, competent, national force but of a number of small unrelated units which can not be bound together. The result of this lack of cohesion entails on the individual members dangers to life and health to which it is mere murder to subject them in the event of serious warfare. In any crisis our militia must find itself outnumbered and at a hopeless disadvantage in every point of organization, training, and equipment.

So completely have the conditions of national life changed in the last half century, so different are the methods of modern warfare, that this readjustment in our methods of defense is necessary to maintain the margin of safety which our isolation has heretofore accorded us. If, as is confidently hoped, general military training shall raise the standards of physical health, make for better understandings between all classes, and engender a spirit of national unity and service, it would amply repay the expense and effort involved, quite apart from the primary need for which it is intended.

The need, however, is, we believe, urgent and calls for the prompt action of Congress.

PHILADELPHIA BOARD OF TRADE,
WM. M. COATES, President.
W. R. TUCKER, Secretary.

Mr. SIMMONS. I present a letter from the Chamber of Commerce of Elizabeth City, N. C., favoring universal military training, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF MANAGER,
CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Elizabeth City, N. C., March 24, 1917.

Senator F. M. SIMMONS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are addressing you in the interest of a bill for universal military training, which we understand will be presented before the session of Congress that meets in April. The bill as we understand it provides for the establishment of training areas and training units. These units will organize and train men in the several areas.

We believe that it is a proper measure and our citizens are interested in its passage.

Thanking you for giving this matter your attention, we are,

Yours, very truly,

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
By C. R. PUGH,
Business Manager.

Mr. SIMMONS. I present a resolution of the Board of Trade of Asheville, N. C., favoring universal military training, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ASHEVILLE BOARD OF TRADE,
Asheville, N. C., April 2, 1917.

Senator F. M. SIMMONS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SIMMONS: At a special meeting of the board of trade held at 12.30 p. m. last Friday, the 30th, the following resolution was unanimously indorsed:

"Resolved, That the Asheville Board of Trade goes on record as being in favor of some form of universal military training."

This organization will be glad to support our representatives in their efforts to secure the desired legislation.

Yours, very truly, N. BUCKNER, Secretary.

Mr. SIMMONS. I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent to have read certain resolutions passed by citizens of Raleigh, N. C., indorsing the President and the action of Congress in the matter of declaring war and of preparedness, and also favoring universal military training.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

RALEIGH, N. C., April 12, 1917.

Be it resolved by the citizens of the city of Raleigh in mass meeting assembled, That we unqualifiedly commend the course of the President of the United States in the conduct of the foreign affairs of the United States Government, and unreservedly indorse the action of Congress in declaring that a state of war exists between the Government of the United States and the Imperial Government of Germany.

That we feel that this is a righteous war and necessary for the preservation of our national rights and of democratic ideals against the aggressions of Prussian absolutism; that we believe it is necessary to the liberties of the world that the central powers should be freed from the autocratic rule of the Hohenzollern and Hapsburg dynasties.

That in our opinion the Government of the United States should wage this war with every energy and resource at its command, upon a basis of universal military service, preserving to each State, as far as may be consistent with military efficiency, the identity of the troops enrolled from that State; and we are of opinion that the Government of the United States should make common cause to the fullest extent with the Governments of the entente allies.

That we urge the State government and the people of North Carolina immediately to formulate plans for conserving, increasing, and mobilizing the resources of the State.

Mr. WARREN. I present a petition of sundry citizens of Sheridan County, Wyo., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The citizens of Sheridan and Sheridan County, Wyo., in mass meeting assembled, on April 5, 1917, unanimously adopted the following:

"We heartily approve of the acts of Congress in declaring war against Germany, and the acts of our President in recommending this course, and we pledge our loyalty in the defense of the honor, rights, and just interests of our country.

"The wrongful acts of the Imperial Government of Germany in violating the sovereignty of peaceful, neighboring nations, maiming and murdering their citizens, destroying their homes, their industries, and their land, and carrying their men and women into slavery; the waging of ruthless submarine warfare, thereby sinking merchant ships without warning, resulting in the wanton murder of our citizens—men, women, and children—while peacefully on the high seas, and forcing the survivors into small, open boats hundreds of miles from land, in direct violation of our treaty with Germany, and contrary to the law of nations, all place the Imperial German Government beyond the pale of civilization, brand that Government an outlaw, and justify all free and peace-loving nations in uniting to overcome the Prussian menace to free government, to forever destroy the rule that 'might makes right,' and to establish for all time the doctrine of the inalienable rights of all people to enjoy life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness without molestation from ambitious and covetous rulers of other nations.

"We urge upon Congress the immediate enactment of a law providing for universal military service as the only and most truly democratic way of obtaining an army which will be at all adequate in the present crisis.

"We call upon all young men of this State to come forward and offer their services to their country. No nobler sentiment than that of patriotism ever inspired heroic action; and it ought to be a sacred honor, duty, and privilege for young men of this Nation to again do, suffer, and sacrifice for the Nation as our ancestors did and suffered and sacrificed in its founding and preservation.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the President, both Houses of Congress, and to each of our Senators and Representatives from Wyoming."

E. E. LOUDBAUGH,
Chairman of the Meeting.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask to have read a letter from the governor of Michigan which I received this morning.

There being no objection, the Secretary read the letter, as follows:

STATE OF MICHIGAN,
EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Lansing, April 13, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter and will say that we promptly took up the matter of conserving and increasing our food products.

I agree with you that our food production is one of the principal war measures that we have It would almost be a crime to take the young people from the farms and put them into field duty. We need their help in raising foodstuff more than we do in fighting.

We have had a great many people come in here offering their services in all kinds of ways, many hundreds of them within the past week, representing many thousands of people, and in each case everyone was willing to do his whole duty and willing to shed every drop of his blood in defense of his country, but I can say that without exception they did not approve of conscription, nor did they approve of our soldiers going across the water. I am writing this to you to let you know the feeling of the people, and you can act accordingly.

Yours, very truly,

ALBERT E. SLEEPER, Governor.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have two petitions adopted by mass meetings in Michigan with reference to universal military training and conscription service, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petitions were ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADRIAN, MICH., April 14, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
The Senate, Washington, D. C.:

At a mass meeting under auspices of the Patriotic League of Lenawee County at the opera house to-night the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That we solemnly demand that Congress pass without delay a law providing for selective conscription for the duration of the war, to take effect as quickly as it can be put into operation; and to stand by the President in every way.

We further declare that this community is intensely opposed to the volunteer system; that universal service has been indorsed unanimously by the county board of supervisors and by a Red Cross mass meeting of 1,500 citizens in this city of 11,000 population; that unless Congress authorizes conscription at once it will be impossible to raise even our proportion of the half million volunteers first called for; and that any effort to raise a larger number would fail utterly. We protest that we are bitterly disappointed and profoundly alarmed by the folly of those who oppose this vitally necessary step, and we warn them that they assume a terrible responsibility.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned citizens and voters, wish to express our appreciation of the patriotic stand taken by our Representatives in Congress during the present national crisis and our gratification that the Michigan delegation was a unit in supporting the President in his war measures.

We further wish to state that we believe in an immediate and effective national defense and urge that you use your every power to bring about the prompt enactment of a law providing for compulsory universal military service under Federal control.

We are convinced such a system affords the only permanent, equitable, democratic safeguard for the liberties of our Nation, to the support of which we give our pledge.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,

DEAR MR. TOWNSEND: The need for cooperation of each and everyone of us in the present crisis appeals strongly to every true and loyal American.

You, as our representative in the United States Senate and as an active worker as well in aiding our Government in preparing for the work cut out for it in this hour of peril, will be interested particularly in the steps this company has taken to manifest its loyalty, patriotism, and willingness to support the Government in its endeavor. The food situation is of paramount importance, and it is in that direction that we can be of some assistance as a unit; therefore wired the Hon. Woodrow Wilson as per copy of telegram inclosed, writing him as per carbon of letter herewith, sending proffer of cooperation likewise to the United States Department of Agriculture.

You, better than anyone else in Washington, know that we are in position to render the assistance offered if it is desired, and perhaps can make this apparent to those in authority who might want to be advised.

Trusting our action is one that has your approval and can be taken as another example of the willingness of Michigan Americans "to do their bit," remain,

With this willingness to serve in our heart, wired you to-day as per copy of message inclosed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I present a petition from farmers of my State praying for an investigation of the binder twine conditions, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SISAL FIBER MONOPOLY.

Petition.

To the honorable United States Senators and Members of the House of Representatives from the State of Nebraska:

We, the undersigned farmers of your State, users of binder twine, an indispensable article in the harvesting of our wheat, oats, rye, and barley, respectfully call your attention to the conditions affecting the price of that commodity.

In the year 1916 we paid an advance of 2 cents per pound over the price of 1915, an advance of $5,000,000 in the total twine bill of American farmers; and we are informed that we will be compelled to pay an additional advance of 5 or 6 cents in 1917, an advance that will add from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 to the total twine bill. These advances have resulted from the control and manipulation of the sisal fiber market by a Yucatan fiber commission, which receives financial backing from American bankers. Under existing conditions we are forced to depend upon Yucatan sisal fiber for the bulk of our binder twine requirements, and competition in the sale of that fiber has been completely destroyed by the action of the Yucatan government in placing the sale of the fiber in the hands of the Yucatan Fiber Commission. This commission has advanced the price of fiber nearly 200 per cent since it obtained control in the fall of 1915.

For additional information concerning the Yucatan monopoly and its operations we respectfully refer you to the proceedings of an investigation conducted by a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in February, March, and April, 1916, and to the report of the findings of that committee submitted to the Senate January 10, 1917.

Believing that nearly all of the advance in the price of sisal fiber is unwarranted and that the combination, consisting of the Yucatan Fiber Commission and the American bankers, exists in violation of the Sherman or other antitrust acts, we earnestly ask your careful consideration and investigation of the situation with a view to obtaining relief for the grain growers from excessive and extortionate prices on binder twine, of which approximately 250,000,000 pounds are used annually by the farmers of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a copy of a joint resolution passed by the General Assembly of the State of Illinois approving the declaration of war and urging its speedy prosecution and pledging support to the Government. I ask that the joint resolution may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
FIFTIETH GENERAL ASSEMBLY.

Senate joint resolution 16.

Whereas it is essential that the United States of America, as one of the foremost nations of the world, should be prepared at all times to defend itself against attacks by hostile forces, to protect its citizens in the exercise of their just rights and privileges, and to prevent unwarranted curtailment or restriction of such rights and privileges; and

Whereas the organization in an emergency of an army of untrained civilians to repel an invasion or to vindicate the Nation's just rights, or those of its citizens, works a great and severe hardship on such civilians in that they, without sufficient military training, may be called upon to meet a hostile army, highly trained and efficient in the art of making war; and

Whereas a system of universal military training will not only prepare the citizens of this Nation for efficient service in the event of war, but, when properly administered, will promote the beneficial physical development of those subject to such training and will instill in the citizens of our country a sense of democracy, patriotism, discipline, and responsibility to duty; and

Whereas the want or lack of such a system of universal military training may result in disaster to our country: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Illinois (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That the General Assembly of the State of Illinois is in accord with and favors the principle of universal military training and requests our Senators and Representatives in Congress to employ every effort to secure the enactment by Congress of a law establishing in the United States of America a system of universal and compulsory military training, and that copies of this resolution be transmitted to our Senators and Representatives in Congress by the secretary of state under seal of the State.

Adopted by the senate March 27, 1917.

President of Senate.
J. H. PADDOCK,
Secretary of Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a resolution adopted by a number of German-American citizens of Kewanee, Ill., a manufacturing town, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to present a telegram for the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], who is detained from the Senate, and ask that it may be printed in the RECORD, together with the signatures.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HANOVER, N. H., April 14, 1917.

Hon. HENRY F. HOLLIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned, officers and members of the faculty of Dartmouth College, wish respectfully to make record of our convictions that a policy of relying upon volunteer enlistments for prosecution of the war will result in an entirely disproportionate assumption of the earliest burdens and risks of war by the youth of greatest initiative and maximum worth throughout the country, thus creating a dearth of men of such characteristics needful for successive levies that the Government is altogether likely to be obliged to make. We believe this to be unwise in theory and dangerous in practice. We subscribe ourselves as believers in the principle of universal service urged by President Wilson and as being desirous of having this principle enacted into law.

AMERICAN FARM LABOR IN CANADA.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I have here a letter from Mr. William H. Brown, formerly a citizen of my State. Mr. Brown is an influential citizen, and he has written me a letter touching upon a question in which I believe the Senate and the country are very much interested at this time. I wish to have the letter read and also a clipping from the Chicago Tribune.

There being no objection, the Secretary read as follows:

JUDITH BASIN, MONT., WHEAT AND ALFALFA FARMS,
Chicago, Ill., April 13, 1917.

Senator A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GRONNA: I know that you are a busy man and that you do not have time to write to everybody who writes to you. I should like to call your attention to a few facts with which I am familiar.

I inclose herewith an advertisement which has been published in our Chicago Daily Tribune and, I presume, in other newspapers throughout the country, by the Canadian Government. This advertisement speaks for itself. Have you seen it before? It is headed "Farm hands wanted—Western Canada farmers require 50,000 American farm laborers at once." It states they want American farm laborers. Please read all of it.

What has our Government to offer to our farmer boys and to the farmer boys in Canada?

I want to suggest that the food producers of this country are largely the boys on the farms. If these boys are rushed away to war, who will produce the wheat, beef, chickens, mutton, ham, eggs, butter, corn, potatoes, and vegetables? The father of these boys alone can make a good living for himself, but he will be unable to produce sufficient food to supply the demand. I think that he and the boys should be urged to stay on the farm. If any great number of the farmer boys is sent to war it will only be a short time before the big cities of this country will face starvation and the big producing farm districts will be ruined for some years to come. The late James J. Hill was right a few years ago when he said, "Unless our farmers farm more intensively, and more of our people stay on the farms, within a few years this great and glorious United States will not produce enough food for its own use."

Some of our farmer boys are enlisted in the Army, and more are ready and desire to go. I think that more of our people should be urged to go back to the soil, or in a short time this country will face starvation, to say nothing about supplying food for other nations.

If it is absolutely necessary, in view of the present crisis to resort to conscription as a means of raising an army, that conscription should be restricted in such a way as to exempt the farmers, upon whom this country is dependent for its very existence.

Why not offer the volunteer soldiers reasonable wages, so that they may be able to provide a living for those dependent upon them?

I know that already it is difficult for us to hire enough men at good wages to go out and work on our farms in the Judith Basin, Mont., and in North Dakota, several thousand acres of which we are now having seeded.

Yours, very truly, WM. H. BROWN.

[From Chicago Tribune, Apr. 4, 1917.]

FARM HANDS WANTED—WESTERN CANADA FARMERS REQUIRE 50,000 AMERICAN FARM LABORERS AT ONCE.

Urgent demand sent out for farm help by the Government of Canada. Good wages. Steady employment. Low railway fares. Pleasant surroundings. Comfortable homes. No compulsory military service. A splendid opportunity for the young man to investigate western Canada's agricultural offerings, and to do so at no expense. Only those accustomed to farming need apply.

The demand for farm labor in Canada is so great that as an inducement to secure at once the necessary help required, Canada will give 160 acres of land free as a homestead and allow the farm laborer, who files on land, to apply the time he is working for other farmers as residence duties the same as if he had lived on the land he had applied for. This offer made only to men working on Canadian farms during 1917, thus making it possible to reduce the necessity of actual residence to two years instead of three years, as under usual conditions. This appeal for farm help is in no way connected with enlistment for military service but solely to secure farm laborers to increase agricultural output. A wonderful opportunity to earn good wages while securing a farm. Canadian Government will pay all fare over 1 cent per mile from St. Paul and Duluth to Canadian destination.

For particulars as to railway rates and districts where labor is required or other information regarding western Canada, apply to

_____,
Authorized Canadian Government Agent.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I present resolutions which I am glad to say will appear in connection with the letter that has just been read, although indicating a somewhat different spirit.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted at a mass meeting at Safford, Ariz.

Whereas the President and Congress of the United States have officially declared that a state of war exists between this country and the Imperial German Government; and

Whereas such a declaration by the United States Government became absolutely necessary because of Germany's utter disregard of every principle of international law, as shown by her acts, unparalleled in history, of utterly destroying, without warning, our ships on the high seas, while they were engaged in the lawful pursuit of carrying passengers and merchandise, and thus casting many of our citizens adrift on the sea without hope of rescue, many of whom, in some instances even women and children, being sent to a cruel and untimely death; and

Whereas in the language of President Wilson, "The world must be made safe for democracy," and the principle that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed must not perish from the earth; and

Whereas it is essential to the accomplishment of this purpose that all governments in which the people rule must stand together against the threats and encroachments of autocratic government wherever found; and

Whereas this nation, through its history of over 140 years, has established beyond question that popular self-government can be and is a success; and

Whereas through the strength and character of our manhood and womanhood, loving good and hating evil and true to our sentiments of loyalty to citizenship and patriotism, we believe in upholding our traditions and preserving our national life, be the cost what it may: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, citizens of the United States of America, residing in Graham County, Ariz., in mass meeting assembled in Safford, in said county, without qualification or reservation on account of religious or political beliefs, hereby commend and indorse the patriotic action of President Wilson and Congress, to the end that American lives and American interests shall be fully protected on land and sea, wherever the flag floats; and be it further

Resolved, That we hereby pledge our earnest, patriotic, and loyal support to the President in this hour of the Nation's peril, in the use of all the Nation's resources at his command for the protection and defense of our beloved country against foreign aggression and for the preservation of our national integrity and honor.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 2762. An act to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense and to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to say that in a very short time I shall be able to file the report of the Finance Committee upon the bill just referred and known as the bond bill.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I submit the conference report on the deficiency appropriation bill, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. Will not the Senator from Colorado withhold the report until morning business is concluded?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the urgency of the situation arises from the fact that the House of Representatives has adjourned until 1 o'clock to-day in anticipation that we would in the meantime adopt the conference report and return it to the House by that hour. I have waited nearly 25 minutes for the conclusion of the presentation of memorials.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that appeal can not be resisted by me, of course.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not believe the conference report will consume any great length of time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the conference report?

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, will the consideration of the conference report interfere with the morning business?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not think so. I presume morning business will be resumed immediately upon the conclusion of the consideration of the report.

Mr. HUGHES. I want to know about that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not a prophet.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The consideration of the conference report will only interfere with morning business during the time it is being considered, and morning business may be resumed immediately after the report is disposed of.

Mr. HUGHES. I shall object to the consideration of the conference report if it is going to interfere with morning business, for I have an important resolution which I desire to have considered during the morning hour.

Mr. SWANSON. I suggest to the Senator from Colorado that he permit the introduction of bills, and then the conference report can be taken up.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The difficulty is, as I have explained it, that the other House has adjourned until 1 o'clock to-day, having no business to transact, and is merely waiting for the disposition of this conference report by the Senate. For that reason, it seems to me, we should dispose of it as soon as possible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"NATIONAL PARK SERVICE.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 11 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the words "to be immediately available" and insert in lieu thereof the words "to be available during the fiscal year 1918"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the words "cost of suit" and insert in lieu there of the words "costs of suits," and in line 12 strike out the word "judgment" and insert in lieu thereof the words "respective judgments"; and the Senate agree to the same.

OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD,
JOHN F. SHAFROTH,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. J. FITZGERALD,
JOHN J. EAGAN,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

ISSUANCE OF BONDS.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on Finance I submit a favorable report (S. Rept. No. 8) with amendments on the bill (H. R. 2762) to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense and to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 8) thereon. The written report I will file just as soon as it can be typewritten, so that both the report and the bill may be printed and ready for the use of the Senate to-morrow morning. In fact, it is my purpose to request to have it printed at once, so that it may be distributed among the Senators this afternoon.

I shall not call up the bill for consideration to-day, because it is thought that probably we may expedite its passage by letting it go over until to-morrow. Immediately upon the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill; and it is the hope and expectation of the committee that we shall to-morrow be able to secure final action upon it before we adjourn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WEEKS. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 995) to authorize the issue to States and Territories of rifles and other property for the equipment of organizations of home guards, to report it favorably with an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. POMERENE, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 634) to promote export trade, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 9) thereon.

Mr. KENYON. I introduce a number of bills. I am somewhat in doubt as to the committee to which the first two bills should be referred. They might properly be referred to the Judiciary Committee or to the Finance Committee. I would prefer to have them referred to the Agricultural Committee if it were possible. While they relate to finances and amend the internal-revenue laws in their purport, at the same time they relate to the question of the conservation of food. I am inclined to think they should go to the Finance Committee.

Mr. PENROSE. It is almost the invariable rule that any amendment to the internal-revenue laws is referred to the Finance Committee.

Mr. KENYON. I think that is true. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry have been having hearings on this question; but it would be a little incongruous, I think, to refer the bills to the Agricultural Committee, much as I should like to have it done. Hence I ask that they may be referred to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 1818) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated, mislabeled, or misbranded linseed oil, turpentine, or paint; to the Committee on Manufactures.

A bill (S. 1819) to amend the internal-revenue law of the United States; and

A bill (S. 1820) to amend the internal-revenue law of the United States; to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (S. 1825) granting an increase of pension to Lewis G. Turner; and

A bill (S. 1826) granting an increase of pension to John A. Wise; to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I introduce a bill entitled "A bill to promote the efficiency of the United States Army and Navy," and ask that it may be printed in the RECORD. It prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors to soldiers in uniform, and also establishes a prohibitory zone about military posts, encampments, etc. I ask that the bill may be printed in the RECORD, and I present certain other bills for reading and proper reference.

The bill (S. 1827) to promote the efficiency of the United States Army and Navy was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill (S. 1827) to promote the efficiency of the United States Army and Navy.

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful to sell, supply, or have in one's possession any intoxicating liquors at any military or naval station, cantonment, camp, fort, post, officers' or enlisted men's club, navy yard, or on board ship, or in any other place which is being used at the time for the purpose of military or naval training or for mobilizing the land or naval forces during the war, and it shall be unlawful to sell, furnish, or give away intoxicating liquor to any officer or member of the military or naval forces while in uniform, or to knowingly furnish to such person or persons intoxicating liquor, whether in uniform or not, or to any employee of the Army or Navy. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are hereby directed to carry these provisions into full force and effect, and they may make regulations permitting the purchase and use of such liquors in hospitals in the military and naval departments for medicinal purposes only.

It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to sell, furnish, or give away any intoxicating liquor as a beverage in, upon, or within 20 miles of any military or naval station, cantonment, camp, fort, post, officers' or enlisted men's club, navy yard, or any other such place which is being used or shall be used at any time during the war for the purpose of training the land or naval forces or mobilizing the same for military or naval service, and no such training or mobilization camp or place shall be established within 20 miles of a city or other location where the sale of intoxicating liquors is permitted for beverage purposes. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are hereby directed to carry these provisions into full force and effect.

BOARD OF MERCHANT SHIPPING DEFENSE.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I submit an amendment to House bill 92, providing a system of national defense, and for other purposes. As this amendment deals with the most important problem in this war—the solution of the question of the submarine torpedo—and upon that solution we could have a termination of the war, I ask that the amendment, which is very short, may be read and referred to the appropriate committee.

There being no objection, the amendment was read and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

There is hereby created in the Department of the Navy a board which shall be known and designated as the "Board of Merchant Shipping Defenses." Said board shall consist of the Chief Constructor of the Bureau of Construction and Repair of the Navy Department, the naval constructor of such bureau, the Commissioner of Patents, and the following other persons to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to wit, one of the highest recognized skill and experience in the construction of merchant ships, one with the highest recognized skill and experience in the navigation of such vessels, and two with the highest recognized skill, experience, and knowledge of mechanical devices used in the great steel manufacturing plants of the country. The Chief of Construction shall be the chairman of said board.

Each member of said board shall receive a salary of $5,000 per year and reasonable expenses while employed in the duties of said board: Provided, That officials receiving salaries from the Government shall not have their salaries diminished by reason of services on said board.

The duty of said board and the purpose of its creation is to provide for and perfect in the shortest possible time such mechanical device or devices as can be successfully used and employed upon a merchant ship while navigating the seas to check or deflect the course of a submarine torpedo and to prevent the same from coming in contact with the hull of the merchant vessel, or to explode the same before such contact, or the perfection of any other mechanical device to protect merchant vessels from destruction by submarine other than by use of defense guns.

The said board immediately upon its organization shall advertise for suggestions from mechanics, inventors, and others, and shall examine into and pass upon the practicability or feasibility of any proposed mechanism. For the purpose of directing the inventive genius of the people of this country toward the protection of merchant shipping against the menace and enormous devastation of submarine torpedoes the sum of $5,000,000 is hereby appropriated as a reward to any person or persons who shall succeed in inventing or producing any mechanism that will accomplish the purpose aforesaid, said sum to be divided among those who have furnished material assistance in the perfecting of any such mechanism, in accordance with the degree of services rendered by him or them, and to be apportioned by said board.

The said board shall furnish all reasonable assistance and opportunities for testing such proposed means and appliances for accomplishing this end.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent to have the President's address of April 2 printed in certain foreign languages. A few days ago the Senate passed a resolution ordering a reprint of the President's address to Congress, and there is a great demand for that address in certain foreign languages, particularly Spanish, Portuguese, and a few other languages. I think there can be no objection, but it can not be done without a resolution. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 33) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the address of the President of the United States delivered at a joint session of the two Houses of Congress on April 2, 1917, be reprinted in such foreign languages as shall be determined upon by the Joint Committee on Printing.

APPEAL TO THE COUNTRY BY THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. OWEN. I send to the desk a resolution, on which I ask immediate action.

Mr. PENROSE. Let the resolution be read for information.

Mr. OWEN. Very well.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 34), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States hereby earnestly indorses the appeal to the American people made by the proclamation of the President of the United States, and joins with the President in urging every citizen of the United States, in this great national crisis, to do his or her utmost to serve the country with the highest patriotic spirit and zeal, with strenuous industry and economy, in factory, field, mine, and forest, on land and sea, and in commerce, and especially to promote and produce the largest supply of nonperishable foodstuffs possible for the ensuing season.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. It is adopted.

INCREASE OF FARM PRODUCTS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in connection with the President's address and appeal to the farmers of the country, published in the papers this morning, urging that every tillable acre of land be cultivated, I have certain correspondence from the honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs showing what the Indian Bureau is doing in this regard and the responses made through the Indian agents of our country. I wish to commend the position taken by the commissioner, as outlined in the correspondence, and showing the wonderful work he is undertaking to accomplish on the Indian reservations, which is in accord with the President's recommendations. In this connection, so that the Senate may know just what is being done, I ask that the letter addressed to me by the commissioner, together with certain other correspondence, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, April 16, 1917.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Complying with your verbal request, I am sending you copy of my telegram sent to 130 superintendents of Indian reservations and schools on April 9, 1917, also copy of my letter to the same people and others of April 12, 1917, together with a few of the many similar telegrams and letters received in reply.

There is every indication that the employees of the Indian Bureau and the Indians will patriotically and promptly respond to our appeal for intensive food production, and that the result will be exceedingly gratifying.

The Indians of the country have come to understand and appreciate their true relationship to our Government. They are fast becoming producers rather than altogether consumers. I am confident that in the impending war situation the Indians will demonstrate themselves, both as tillers of the soil and as soldiers, in such manner as to command the admiration of the white citizens of the Nation.

Sincerely, yours,

CATO SELLS,
Commissioner.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 9, 1917.

To KNEALE, Supterintendent,
Uintah and Ouray, Utah:

War situation makes it imperative that every tillable acre of land on Indian reservations be intensively cultivated this season to supply food demands, particularly wheat, beans, potatoes, corn, and meat. Call farmers and leading Indians together immediately for organized united effort under your continuous supervision. This is of the highest importance and requires aggressive action. There must be no delay in anything necessary to insure results. You are authorized to take older boys out of school temporarily for farm work. Wire what may be expected and report progress by letter.

CATO SELLS, Commissioner.

FOOD SITUATION.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, April 12, 1917.

To SUPERINTENDENTS:

I am much gratified at the prompt and enthusiastic responses to my telegram of April 9, urging increased production of foodstuffs by the Indians. Plans are already under way on practically every reservation. This campaign must be aggressively followed up by every means within our reach. The exact methods to be followed will depend upon the conditions on each reservation and upon the superintendent's ingenuity in devising ways and means.

As stated in my telegram the war situation makes it imperative that every tillable acre of land be intensively cultivated. With the entry of the United States into the world war the importance of an increased food supply can not be overestimated. We must sacrifice every nonessential along other lines for this supreme object. The service farmers should get into the field early and stay late, encouraging and assisting the Indians in every way possible. Enlist the cooperation of the lessees of Indian land and of the white farmers in the vicinity. This appeal is based on both enconomic and patriotic grounds. See that it is brought home to every employee and Indian on the reservation through the farmers and other industrial employees. Publish it in the school and agency papers and circulate it by every other means which may occur to you. Appeal to the patriotism of the Indians. Show how they can serve their country effectively in the present emergency by exerting themselves to the uttermost in the production of foodstuffs. While my telegram mentioned foodstuffs, "particularly wheat, beans, potatoes, corn, and meat," there should be no diminution in the production of forage for your own use.

With "a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together," I feel that the Indians will play a large and important part in the economic history of the Nation during this period of war stress.

Bread and meat are an essential factor in this dreadful emergency, and I am extremely anxious that the Indians shall fully demonstrate their devotion to our country and their capacity for industrial accomplishment, as well as otherwise should circumstances require.

The success of our efforts in this respect will depend very largely upon the ability, aggressiveness, and diligence of the superintendents having immediate supervision. Report progress from time to time by letter and do not permit any let-up in this campaign.

HASKELL INSTITUTE,
Lawrence, Kans., April 11, 1917.

Hon. CATO SELLS,
Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. COMMISSIONER: Your telegram of the 9th relating to the shortage of food supply and suggestion that we make the best possible use of the school farm during the coming season was received and answered by wire yesterday, the message being as follows:

"Your telegram 9th. Pushing farm and garden work to the limit of man and horse power. Season very dry, therefore favorable for Haskell farm. Practically all land plowed. Early farm and garden crops planted. Doing well. Definite plans made for planting every available acre of school land and have rented a farm of 70 acres adjoining school. I assure you hearty cooperation from all here. If the season is favorable throughout will break the record here in producing food supplies. The elements only can defeat the effort being and to be made. Letter follows."

Having seen the school farm here, you may be interested to know just what the plans are and how they are developing, therefore I am writing because I could not give full information in a telegram without making it too long.

The present season has been very dry, and therefore has been unusually favorable for getting the spring work done on the school farm. The organization of the help has not been very satisfactory, but that has been corrected by changing the position of assistant farmer to that of laborer, thus making it possible to use help that we have at the school without increasing the total salary list.

As I said in the telegram, practically all of the tillable land available for cultivation has been plowed. In fact, the plowing will be completed within a day or two. Sixty acres of wheat were sowed last fall, and the prospect is fairly good for a reasonable crop. The winter was extremely dry and some of the wheat killed out, but I believe if the spring season is favorable we ought to get at least three-fourths of a yield. I am sorry that there was not a larger acreage sowed, but, of course, it was too late to sow wheat in this section of the country when I came.

The following spring crops have been planted:

Thirty-five acres of oats, for grain crop.

Thirty-seven acres of land is ready to sow to oats and alfalfa, the oats to be used as a hay crop. The land is thin and needs to be seeded. We will need the alfalfa for the dairy as well as to bring up the land.

Ten acres of alsike.

Twenty-two acres of red clover.

One hundred and thirty acres ready for corn.

Thirty acres of potatoes, planted.

Ten acres ready for sorghum, for hay.

Seven acres ready for cane, for making sirup.

Five acres mangels and turnips.

Two acres ready for broom corn, from which we will make brooms for use in the school.

Two acres ready for rape, for hog pasture.

Garden crops as follows, planted or to be planted:

Two acres beans, string, for canning.

Three acres peas, for canning.

Two and one-half acres onions, for winter use.

Three acres cabbage for winter use.

Five acres tomatoes, for canning.

Seven acres corn, for canning.

Two acres pumpkins, for canning.

Ten acres beans, navy and other varieties, for winter use.

Five acres sweet potatoes.

Beets, cucumbers, squash, cauliflower, and miscellaneous garden vegetables of great variety, of sufficient acreage to supply the school during the summer and fall months, and, so far as possible, for winter use.

There are 280 acres of wild hay, all of which will be cut twice, if the season is favorable. Also 25 acres of alfalfa, which should yield four crops; 5 acres of alsike and timothy; and 15 acres of timothy.

Because of so much of the pasture land of the school farm being low and subject to floods, I thought it advisable to rent some land adjoining the school, if possible, and have made arrangements for about 70 acres which joins on the east. This land is not of a strong quality, but there are probably 35 acres of good blue-grass pasture; about 20 acres of prairie meadow, which will be cut for hay and pastured in the fall; and probably 10 to 15 acres of land, which will be put into oats to furnish oats hay. There is also a small field of crimson clover, which will be used as pasture late in the fall.

I have had the space between the trees in the orchard plowed not only because the trees will be better because of the plowing but because the land should be utilized for raising garden stuff. I am planning to have even the spaces in the rows utilized in raising cucumbers, canteloupes, and water melons. Have advised employees to raise their own vegetables so far as possible, and will allow each family which cares to do so to have a small garden patch. The employees' club will be given a small tract of land and will raise vegetables for their own use. In fact, as I stated in the telegram, we are planning to use every available acre, or fraction of an acre, on the school farm and in the garden, orchards, and everywhere to produce food supplies.

We are also planning to establish a large poultry department. We are moving what poultry houses there are to higher and drier land, and getting ready to start the poultry business in such a way as to make it really worth while for the school. Hope to be able to raise chickens enough to supply the school on special occasions, such as Thanksgiving, Christmas, etc., and to furnish as many eggs as possible.

The dairy is supplying at this time about 150 gallons of milk per day. As soon as we can turn the cows on the pasture, that quantity will be increased. If the season is favorable, we ought to raise plenty of forage and rough feed of all kinds for the dairy. Of course, with as large a dairy as is kept here, it will probably be necessary to buy ground feed unless we are unusually fortunate. The conditions last year, as you know, were such as to make the results very unsatisfactory. Every pound of grain and ground feed not only for the dairy but for the horses has been purchased, and it is a very heavy expense, of course. Corn chop at the present time is costing $52 per ton and bran $38. With a favorable season it certainly will not be necessary to buy anything next year except bran. Of course, very much depends upon the season, but I assure you we will do everything that it is possible for us to do to produce food supplies of every kind. The general conditions in this section of the country with reference to wheat are really alarming. I am told that a large proportion of the acreage of wheat in the western part of this State is in very bad condition and it is probable that the crop will be almost an entire failure over most of that portion of the State. The prospect at present for a fruit crop is fairly good. It is out intention to purchase a canning outfit and to can fruit and vegetables of all kinds during the summer if we succeed in raising them.

I shall be very glad indeed to have suggestions at any time concerning the effort to make the agricultural department of this school do its whole part.

Very truly, yours, H. B. PEAIRS, Superintendent.

PRICE OF AMERICAN FLAGS.

Mr. POMERENE. I send to the desk a resolution and ask that it be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 35), as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and is hereby, directed to make an immediate investigation into the operations and accounts of the leading concerns engaged in the industry of the manufacture, distribution, and sale of American flags and the materials out of which they are made, for the purpose of ascertaining the facts concerning the recent increase in price of American flags, and into any unfair practices or monopolistic conditions that may obtain in the industry, and report the same to the Senate during the present session of Congress, if possible.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I was prompted to offer this resolution by a letter I received from a very prominent firm of merchants in Ohio who are dealers in flags. This firm is reputable and reliable, and I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I read just a paragraph from the letter written to me on the subject:

On account of the recent demand for flags, the jobbing price of one grade of flags has been increased from $3.35 to $8.50 per gross. On the wool bunting flags recently a discount of 40 per cent on the list price was allowed to jobbers. The price to-day has been advanced to 35 per cent added to the list price and the factories refuse to accept any more orders for shipment on April 15 except at prices which may prevail at that time. You can readily figure that the advance during the past month has been from 100 per cent to 250 per cent already, and as quotations have been withdrawn it rather indicates an advance of 300 to 400 per cent.

I feel that this matter ought to be investigated, and I therefore ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not hear the resolution when it was read. What method is suggested for the investigation?

Mr. POMERENE. By the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. PENROSE. That is all right.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

OSAGE INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. WALSH submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 36), which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, requested to transmit to the Senate information as to the number of leases of lands of the Osage Indians, in the State of Oklahoma, issued or authorized since the 1st day of January, 1916, and the area embraced therein, designating the number of and area embraced in leases of lands within the bounds of the so-called Foster lease, and particularly as to how far there is community of actual ownership between the lessees in such leases, what effort is being made to prevent the monopoly of such lands under such leases; to advise the Senate of the number of applications for leases pending and the area covered thereby, and to supplement such communication as he may make in reply to this resolution with a schedule showing as to both leases issued and applications pending, the lessee or applicants, the date, the area, and the community of interest, if any such exists.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator from Montana that in accordance with our usual custom the word "directed" should be substituted for the word "requested" in the resolution.

Mr. WALSH. I gladly adopt the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be so amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. OVERMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 37), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

WASHINGTON RAILWAY & ELECTRIC CO.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I call up Senate resolution 23.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 23, submitted by Mr. HUGHES on the 4th instant, and reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate by Mr. THOMPSON on the 12th instant, which was read, as follows:

Whereas differences have arisen between the Washington Railway & Electric Co. (a street railway corporation in the District of Columbia, created and existing by virtue of the act of Congress approved June 5, 1900) and certain of its employees, by reason of which said employees declared a strike or "walkout" on Monday, March 12, 1917, and withdrew from the service of the company; and

Whereas the failure of the said street railway company and its employees to settle and adjust their differences has caused and is causing great public inconvenience and loss; and

Whereas it is in the interest of the public safety and welfare that the causes of the existing differences between the Washington Railway & Electric Co. and its employees should be ascertained and a means devised, if possible, whereby the same may be justly accommodated: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, who are hereby given full authority to investigate the cause or causes which have occasioned the present strike by the said employees of the Washington Railway & Electric Co., and to report the result of its investigation, with such recommendations as it may deem proper to make, to the Senate at the earliest possible day, and the said committee or subcommittee thereof is hereby given power and authority to summon witnesses, administer oaths, and take testimony under oath as to all matters and things covered by this resolution and to employ such clerical and stenographic assistance as may be necessary in the premises, the expenses of said committee to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when the resolution was before the Senate a few days ago I made a motion to refer it to the Committee on the District of Columbia, feeling that it was of sufficient moment to warrant the careful consideration of a standing committee. The Senate in its wisdom voted against the motion I had made by a majority of 6, as I remember it.

I have no disposition, Mr. President, to make any further effort to secure what I think ought to be done in the interest of good legislation. We have a Committee on the District of Columbia and we also have a Committee on Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia. Either one of those committees would properly have jurisdiction over a matter of this kind. But the Senator from New Jersey was earnest and determined in his purpose of having the matter disposed of directly, without committee action. If the Senator still thinks that is the wise thing to do, I shall make no further objection to the resolution, but I can not help believing that the Senator from New Jersey is making a mistake in forcing the matter at this time without sending it to a committee having jurisdiction of the subject, which committee would determine whether or not it is wise to make the proposed investigation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I was perfectly willing that the cost of the investigation should be authorized, or "sanctioned," as the law terms it. The only object I had in desiring it reported as I thought the committee should report it, and did report it, was because the Committee on the District of Columbia has the subject matter of the resolution under its jurisdiction. I do not think there is a member of that committee who would not have given attention to the resolution and as to whether it was really a proper thing to undertake an investigation of the question at this particular time.

I shall not object, Mr. President, to the present consideration of the resolution. The Senate, as the Senator from New Hampshire has said, decided that this matter should not go to the regular committee or the committee that has jurisdiction of the subject matter of the resolution, and that a special committee should be appointed for the purpose. As far as I am concerned I care nothing more about it. I suppose that the special committee will give it just as close attention and as much care and investigation as the regular committee having the subject matter under jurisdiction would have done.

Therefore, Mr. President, as far as I am personally concerned I did not object to the present consideration of the resolution, and I shall say nothing further in relation to the question.

Mr. HARDING. I should like to submit an amendment to the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 5, on page 2, after the word "Company," insert the following:

And to make full inquiry into such acts of violence and lawless destruction of property as have taken place during the progress of the strike and what steps have been taken by the police force of the District of Columbia to prevent such acts of lawlessness.

Mr. HUGHES. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I observe there is no limit to the expenditures this committee may make, and I think it might well be limited. I move, at the end of the resolution to have the words inserted "not to exceed the sum of $5,000."

Mr. HUGHES. I have no doubt that $5,000 will be sufficient. At the same time I do not think we ought to treat this investigating committee any differently from the way in which we treat any other committee. There has been an additional element of investigation injected into the resolution which may be quite far-reaching in its scope. Of course, as the Senator knows, I do not like to see public money squandered any more than he does; but I do not think we ought to put a limit of $5,000 upon the investigation.

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not seem to me that the investigation is going to be very wide in its scope. There has been a strike on a street railroad in the city of Washington, and the strike has failed, and having failed they come now to Congress and ask Congress to take up the controversy and make an investigation. I recall, Mr. President, an appropriation that was made not long ago for the investigation of a certain matter in the District of Columbia, and if the newspapers are correct the amount of money that was suggested in that resolution has been greatly exceeded, and that seems to be the rule nowadays. I feel sure that $5,000 is more than should be expended, but at the same time it is always well to put a limit on the amount of money that is to be expended in an investigation. It has been almost the universal rule. Yet if the Senator feels this ought not to be done I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HUGHES. I do. I hope the investigation can be conducted with an expenditure of much less than $5,000, and I will cooperate in every way I can to see that it does.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think, myself, it ought not to cost $5,000.

Mr. HUGHES. I agree with the Senator, but I prefer under the circumstances not to have that limit placed upon the investigation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well. I will withdraw the amendment, in deference to the wishes of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator from New Jersey know that it will not cost $5,000?

Mr. HUGHES. I hope so and believe so. At the same time I prefer that it be not limited. In view of the situation as it exists, I do not think we ought to put ourselves in the position of attempting to hamper any investigation.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps I ought to say that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate did not discuss the question of cost. The Senator from New Hampshire is right wherein he states that the cost of an investigation is generally limited. I will say to the Senator that I do not think there was anything presented to the committee to indicate what the cost would be, nor was there any intimation made as to how extensive an investigation would take place. I asked the Secretary of Labor for his opinion as to the investigation, and he stated that he had already done all that he could, that the Public Utilities Commission of the District had done all they could do, but expressed the opinion that the investigation might bring out something new regarding the situation. That is as far as he recommended the investigation, and I thought it very proper that it should go no further.

Of course, if the Senator does not desire to have a limitation put on the expenditure I shall not insist, but I do not believe the investigation is going to cost $5,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Was the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire withdrawn?

Mr. HUGHES. It was withdrawn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK subsequently said:

Mr. President, since the Senate acted on the motion that when it adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, my attention has been called to the fact that a Republican conference has been called for 10 o'clock to-morrow. Therefore I ask that the motion be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the motion is reconsidered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senate therefore will meet to-morrow under its standing order at 12 o'clock noon.

JUSTIFICATION OF THE WAR WITH GERMANY BY THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, a few days since I received a letter from a well-known lawyer in Oklahoma advising me that many of the people in his neighborhood were opposed to war with Germany, and saw no reason for it, and asking me, gravely, what justification I could offer for it. It is clear from my correspondence that some of our citizens do not fully understand some of the most important facts which justified the United States in accepting the repeated challenge to war by the Imperial German Government. Some of our people seem moved by the obvious truth that war is deplorable and to believe we ought not to engage in this war.

Mr. President, certainly war is deplorable, but abject cowardly submission to tyranny, to persistent wrong, to brute force, is more deplorable—it is despicable. America is incapable of such submission.

Submission to the brute force of Germany by France, by Russia, or by England in the last two years would probably have ended the democracies of the world; would have put the United States in the most deadly peril; and for us to submit to her brute force now would put both our present and our future in jeopardy.

I rejoice that the President of the United States has pointed out the danger to the world and to the civilization of the world of the triumph of the Imperial Government of Germany in this European conflict. I rejoice that on entering this conflict the mighty powers of this great Republic will be used alone in defending and preserving liberty; not in a spirit of malice or hatred of the German people, but against the house of Hohenzollern; to assist in taking from the hands of William II the power to further brutalize the great German people who have infinitely deserved a better fate.

I have always admired the German people. I have admired their sturdy common sense, their industry, their virtues, and their home-loving qualities. I have admired their intellectual attainments, their internal democratic development, their progress in the sciences, in the arts. I have loved their music and enjoyed their poetry and their literature. Notwithstanding their confessed good qualities, their natural peace-loving qualities, the actual governmental control of the German people has since 1870 been under the directing hand of the Prussian military machine, that subordinates every other interest of statecraft—agriculture, factories, commerce, school, church, home—to military power and to the aggrandizement of the house of Hohenzollern and of the smaller allied German kings and princes.

The Prussian King, ex officio Emperor, claims to rule by "divine right," without the consent of the German people, and he does rule them without their consent.

Any citizen who criticizes the Government, the Emperor, or the King of Prussia is guilty of a crime, lèse majesté, subject to instant imprisonment. The citizen is a subject; he is not free.

The press is not free, and the educational system, from kindergarten, gymnasium, and high school to university, is controlled by the dominant power of the Kaiser, and the people have been taught systematically and thoroughly that obedience is the first duty of a subject of the Kaiser and that the doctrine of the military powers is right; and, unhappily, the doctrine of the military powers of Germany is that might makes right; that military necessity is not bound by treaty, by moral law, or by any other law; that terrorism or frightfulness is a lawful weapon in the hands of the military machine; that when a soldier makes himself terrible by wholesale slaughter and destruction, regardless of the laws of humanity, he shortens the war by intimidating those who would oppose.

Thus it is that the German people have been led to their doom by this ungodly, vicious military machine; thus it is that they have alienated the sympathy of the whole world, and those Americans who have loved the German people see no way to protect the world or to protect the German people except by overthrowing Prussian militarism, overthrowing the Hohenzollerns.

While the people of Germany are by nature democratic and peace loving, nevertheless their order, obedience, industry, their very virtues, their efficiency, as subjects of the Kaiser, have been made an instrumentality in the hands of the military machine which threatens the peace of the whole world, which threatens our peace, and has waged war on us in spite of every effort on our part to prevent it.

Mr. President, while Bismarck made many concessions to the development of local democracy in Germany and developed a great democratic efficiency in Germany as a concession to the constantly increasing intelligence of the German people, as a concession to the constantly increasing demand for democracy in Germany, nevertheless in framing the German Empire he and the Hohenzollerns so framed it as to put that Empire under the practical domination of the Kingdom of Prussia, whose King claimed to govern mankind by the "divine right" and in partnership with Almighty God Himself, a doctrine descended from Frederick II, sometimes called "the Great," but who did not believe in God at all in the affairs of men except in so far as the affectation of that belief served his selfish ambitions.

The control of the German Empire by Prussia and the control of Prussia by the house of Hohenzollern left William the Second the master of the army and navy, of the war machine, with the power to declare war. The consent of the subordinate Bundesrath, composed of appointees of the kings and princes of Germany was not necessary. He and his military captains have been moved by the principle of the Hohenzollern family, ambition, first, last, and all the time; ambition, wrapped in the cloak of pure patriotism, parading as Germany, as the fatherland; but always beneath has been the determined purpose to aggrandize the house of Hohenzollern and the army. Hence arose the military slogan "Deutschland über Alles," which being interpreted meant "The house of Hohenzollern and the military autocracy—über Alles." Hence the greatly exploited notion of "Weltmacht," which meant power over the world by the Hohenzollerns and their military autocracy. Hence that mysterious toast "Der Tag," which meant THE DAY when the house of Hohenzollern and the military autocracy would rule all mankind, the day when autocratic military power would rule mankind under the blasphemous claim of "divine right," and should impose its will over the liberties of the civilized and uncivilized nations of the world through brute force and terrorism or "Schrecklichkeit." The world is compelled to teach the Kaiser and his subject soldiers the folly of trying to terrorize the world.

In some things this Government may well profit by the glorious example of the German Government. They have magnificently developed vocational industrial education, have established innumerable cooperative democratic societies, State insurance against old age, accidents, and so forth, and have thoroughly cared for the unemployed man and made him self-supporting, and have wonderfully developed municipal ownership, and so forth. Organized industrial democracy has been made the helpless tool of political military autocracy, and the Germans in large measure seem not to see this.

In August, 1914, when the ambitious Hohenzollerns had artfully contrived to prepare their war machine with an overwhelming supply of cannon, powder, shells, machine guns, rifles, transportation material, and all the accouterments of war; when they found France inadequately protected, Russia without war supplies, England with no army, Luxemburg and Belgium incapable of defense, they threw suddenly this desolating war machine of terrorism like an avalanche on the fair fields of Luxemburg, Belgium, and France, intending to seize Paris, force a treaty with France, impose a giant indemnity, as it did it 1870, then dominate Russia, and establish throughout the world "Der Tag," "Weltmacht," "Deutschland über Alles," and establish the house of Hohenzollern as the military autocratic rulers of mankind in the sweeping destruction of the liberties of the world.

The Hohenzollerns under Frederick William of Brandenburg and Prussia, under Frederick the Second and his successors have always followed the doctrine that—Might makes right.

They have always despised the American doctrine of Abraham Lincoln, who had "the faith to believe that right would make might."

The Hohenzollerns always believed in the doctrine of absolute monarchy as against limited monarchy or democracy in any form. Under them Prussia has been an armed camp, an army for over a hundred and fifty years, glorifying war and military power and for 50 years keeping Europe in a state of constant suspense and apprehension of the blow which all Europe feared but believed would sometime surely fall. The Hohenzollerns believed in the false monarchial doctrines of the Bourbons, whose principles you will find cast in bronze on the cannon we took from Spain in 1898, now mounted at the north end of the War Department in Washington City.

On the mouth of one of these cannon, called de Mareschal Le Duc de Humieres, you will find these words:

"Le passe par tous"—

The passway through everything. That is, the cannon's mouth is the passway through broken treaties, through the boundaries of undefended neighbors, through justice and righteousness, through industry and honor—the pathway to the so-called "glory" of kings and the ruin of peoples. On the base of that cannon you will find the words:

"Nec pluribus impar"—

Not unequal to many. That is, the cannon is not unequal to many people—to very many people. It can slay people; it can dominate people; it can tax millions without the consent of the people. This is the doctrine of autocracy against democracy.

On the body of that Bourbon cannon you will find the phrase:

"Ultima ratio regum"—

The final argument of kings. When the people argue for self-government, when the people argue that justice is justice, that right is right, that their conscience is the whispering of the spirit of God, then the people hear the final argument of kings, the final argument of the Hohenzollerns and of military autocracy—the cannon's roar—who would teach the world the pernicious doctrine that might makes right.

These are the real principles of military autocracy when moved by the royal family pride; by cold, selfish ambition, playing upon the prejudices, the weaknesses, the ignorances of mankind. Yes; playing upon the most sacred sentiments of mankind; playing even upon the trust of mankind in the Divine Spirit. These vicious military autocratic forces which are now assailing the liberties of mankind under the grossly false pretense of protecting the German people against their supposed enemies are the same in spirit that established the "Holy Alliance" signed by "Alexander the First," Emperor of Russia, of the Romanoff family; by Francis the First, Emperor of Austria, of the Hapsburgs; by Frederick William the Third, King of Prussia, of the Hohenzollerns, in 1815, in which they pledged themselves—

"to take for their sole guide the precepts of that holy religion (the Savior taught), namely, the precepts of justice, Christian charity, peace";

Pledged themselves—

"by unalterable good will, the mutual affection with which they ought to be animated; to consider themselves all as members of one and the same Christian nation; the three allied princes looking on themselves as merely delegated by Providence to govern three branches of the one family, namely, Austria, Prussia, and Russia, thus confessing that the Christian world, of which they and their people form a part, has in reality no other sovereign than Him to whom alone power really belongs, because in Him alone are found all the treasures of love, science, and infinite wisdom—that is to say, God, our Divine Savior, the Word of the Most High, the Word of Life."

The Holy Alliance had for its sinister, deceitful purpose the misleading of the people of these great countries, through the piety and good will of the people, into the belief that their leadership was actually moved by these high holy sentiments.

The history of Europe demonstrated that they were moved by nothing of the kind, but alone by their own selfish ambitions, and that they made this pretended treaty for the purpose merely of establishing themselves in the confidence of their people and of neighboring religious peoples, while in reality they were constantly engaged in enriching themselves and their court favorites and their own families at the expense of the people, and never hesitated to sacrifice the poor people, their subjects, their quasi slaves, on the field of battle or in exile in order to further the family interests of the Romanoffs, the Hapsburgs, and the Hohenzollerns. It was an autocratic military combination intended to promote the selfish interests of these families by military force and to enable them in concert to prevent the people of Russia, Prussia, and Austria making any headway in self-government, and to prevent the self-government of men making progress in any other part of the world. This blasphemous combination—I say blasphemous, because they pretended to have a charter from the Throne of Grace and to govern by divine right under the special sanction of the Almighty, when they well knew the corruption of their own courts and of their own selfishness—amended this self-serving declaration of 1815 of their own "holiness" by adding several articles to this treaty of peculiar interest to all democracies.

In 1822 the "Holy Alliance" added certain articles known as the Secret Treaty of Verona, as follows:

"ARTICLE 1. The high contracting powers being convinced that the system of representative government is equally as incompatible with the monarchial principles as the maxim of the sovereignty of the people with the divine right, engage mutually, in the most solemn manner, to use all their efforts to put an end to the system of representative governments, in whatever country it may exist in Europe, and to prevent its being introduced in those countries where it is not yet known.

"ART 2. As it can not be doubted that the liberty of the press is the most powerful means used by the pretended supporters of the rights of nations to the detriment of those of princes, the high contracting parties promise reciprocally to adopt all proper measures to suppress it, not only in their own States, but also in the rest of Europe."

Here we find the Hohenzollerns and the Hapsburgs, who still dominate Germany and Austria, making a solemn covenant with the Romanoffs of Russia and with the Bourbons, through King Louis XVIII, of France, whom they had placed upon the French throne, and solemnly engaging in—

A deliberately prepared and deadly compact to destroy all the democracies of the world;

To stamp out the liberty of the press in all Europe, even outside their own dominions; and thus—

To keep all mankind in ignorance, in order that they and their families, who were constantly intermarrying with other like families, might continue to dominate mankind by military force.

This blasphemous "Holy Alliance" by this very treaty furnished 20,000,000 francs annually to Louis XVIII to wage war on the limited monarchy of Spain, which the people of Spain had by painful revolution established and to reestablish an absolute monarchy in Spain under the same prince, in order to discourage and break down any right whatever of the people of Spain to govern themselves. They did not hesitate to cause the murder of the people of Spain to carry out their "holy" Christian purposes.

This blasphemous "Holy Alliance" then sent an Austrian army into Italy and accomplished the same identical purpose, murdering the Italian people for the same "holy" Christian reasons. This wicked "Holy Alliance" then proposed sending other armies and navies to North and South America for the purpose, as they said, of "reducing the revolting colonies of Spain and Portugal on the Western Hemisphere" and thus strangling all representative governments at their birth throughout North and South America. What they really meant was that they intended to send an army into Brazil to destroy a republic in Brazil, to send an army into the Argentine, into Chile, into Colombia, into Peru, into Venezuela, into the Central American States, and into Mexico, to suppress the freedom of the people, to prevent their governing themselves, to put them again under an absolute monarchy, so that the monarchial principle should govern all mankind, and democracy never should be permitted to establish its foot upon the entire earth. That was their purpose.

Canning, of Great Britain, notified this detestable conspiracy, known as the "Holy Alliance," that Great Britain would oppose such an assault on the former colonies of Spain and Portugal, for Great Britain, though a limited monarchy, was already a great representative government, loving liberty and justice.

President Monroe, advised of this conspiracy of the houses of Hohenzollern and of Hapsburg to invade the liberties of North and South America, sent his message to Congress in December, 1823, in which he made the following statement of principles known as the "Monroe doctrine."

He said:

"It is impossible that the allied powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness; nor can anyone believe that our southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord. It is equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition in any form with indifference."

He said:

"With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the Governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States."

This firm stand taken by Great Britain and the United States prevented representative government and the democracies of the Western Hemisphere from being destroyed by the unlimited rapacity and cold-blooded ambition of the Hohenzollerns, the Hapsburg, and their "holy" associates.

Mr. President, this same group attempted to set up a monarchial government in Mexico, when the United States was embarrassed and in the throes of the Civil War, by sending Mexico an emperor—Maximilian, an Austrian gentleman of the Hapsburg family—who quickly had some unhappy dealings with the democracies of the Western Hemisphere. Let him repose in peace. The action of the United States overthrew Maximilian and ended an overt act of the Hapsburgs against our national peace.

Mr. President, those who have observed the development of this great war machine in Germany as an instrumentality by which the Hohenzollerns might dominate mankind will see quite clearly the attitude of the military autocracy set forth in the book, Germany and the Next War, by its mouthpiece, Gen. von Bernhardi, October, 1911. Von Bernhardi is fairly a spokesman of the military autocracy of Germany. He glorified war. He insisted in that volume—and it was sent all over this country, by hundreds of thousands—that the German people must be awakened and compelled to show their military strength. He praised to the skies the great elector, Frederick William of Brandenburg, the first important member of the House of Hohenzollern. Listen to Von Bernhardi praising this wonderful Prussian general, ruling by divine right a population of two and a quarter millions, with a hundred thousand armed men trained to the last degree of efficiency and better supplied with munitions of war than any other army in Europe. Listen to his praise of the great elector:

"The great elector laid the foundations of Prussia's power by successful and deliberately incurred wars. Frederick the Great followed the example of his glorious ancestors. He noticed how his State occupied an untenable middle position between the petty States and the great powers, and showed his determination to give a definite character (décider cet être) to his anomalous existence; it had become essential to enlarge the territory of the State and corriger la figure de la Prusse, if Prussia wished to be independent and to bear with honor the great name of KINGDOM. The King made allowance for this political necessity and took the bold determination of challenging Austria to fight. None of the wars which he fought had been forced upon him; none of them did he postpone as long as possible. He had always determined to be the aggressor."

Frederick II followed him, idealizing war, waging war on defenseless people, as when he first took his place as King of Prussia he violated the treaty with Maria Theresa of Austria, broke faith, treated the treaty as a scrap of paper, threw 50,000 highly trained, seasoned, skilled soldiers upon Silesia, undefended because relying upon his good faith, and he kept all Europe in turmoil for years and years and years, and at that time waged seven years of continuous warfare.

It might be said that his opponents in France and in Austria were no better than he, as far as keeping faith was concerned, because the house of Bourbon and the house of Hapsburg occupied the French and the Austrian thrones, and were represented by those who were just as deceitful as was Frederick himself.

Frederick the Great is now the ideal of the Prussian military autocracy. Only a year or two ago the United States was presented with a statue of Frederick the Great, and it is standing down before our War College now. My own opinion is that the statue of Frederick the Great ought to be gently and quietly removed from its spot and dropped in some quiet place in the Potomac River where it will no longer serve to give dignity and honor to this cruel and unscrupulous prince.

The Imperial German Government presented us with its ideal in the statue of Frederick, the embodiment of war and rapacity and broken treaties.

France presented us with the French ideal, Bartholdi's wonderful conception, standing guarding the entrance to our greatest port—New York—where all the world may see "Liberty enlightening the world."

God bless France and speed her prophecy.

Once too often the Hohenzollerns have been the aggressors of the world's peace, and now this world-wrecking spirit will be terminated forever by the indignant power of the whole world. In that respect I am rejoiced to see Brazil following the United States; first of all, little Cuba declaring war on Germany, and following her father, the United States, who gave her peace and gave her liberty against a prince of the Hapsburg family. Here comes Brazil; the Argentine will follow; Paraguay, Uruguay, Peru, Bolivia, and the Central American States may be expected to follow; and I expect to see even Mexico show her sympathy with the democracies of the world, and with this great struggle to put down forever the irresponsible ambitions leading armed military forces that have no conception of human liberty, whose one idea is obedience and to rule the world by military efficiency and by terrorism.

Mr. President, I rejoice to believe that this war which we shall now wage with all the resources of 100,000,000 people; with all the financial power of the richest Nation on the globe; with all the vast equipment of material, of factories, of American inventions on the Imperial Government of Germany, will render the most gigantic service to the German people which it is possible for one people to render to another in delivering them from the military tyranny and the political control of the Hohenzollerns and their military clique, who have taxed and driven the German people beyond all human endurance; who have kept all the nations of Europe trembling under the load of universal military preparation for 50 years. It was Germany that prevented disarmament a few years ago at The Hague. Even Nicholas II proposed it, and Germany, of all the nations, prevented it.

This German military autocracy have finally driven the people of Germany to overwhelming slaughter on the battle fields of Europe, and have compelled the liberty-loving, God-fearing democracies of the whole world, in defense of liberty and righteousness, to turn their guns on the unhappy Germans led to the shambles by the heartless ambitions of the Hapsburgs and Hohenzollerns.

No man who has studied the history of recent Europe questions for a moment the bloodguiltiness of the Hapsburgs, who in avenging the wicked assassination of the Crown Prince of Austria-Hungary imposed 10 demands on Serbia, to everyone of which Serbia submitted save the relinquishment of her sovereignty and the violation of her constitution. (See chap. 4, Obstacles of Peace, by S. S. McClure.)

The gist of the Austrian demands, of which there were 10, was as follows:

"1. Serbia shall suppress all anti-Austrian publications.

"2. Dissolve the Narodna Odbrana and all similar societies, confiscate their funds, and prevent their re-forming.

"3. Remove from public education in Serbia all teachers and teaching that are anti-Austrian.

"4. Remove from military and civil service all officers and officials guilty of anti-Austrian propaganda; Austria will name the persons.

"5. Accept collaboration of Austrian representatives in the suppression of anti-Austrian propaganda.

"6. Take judicial proceedings against accessories to the plot against the archduke; Austrian delegates will take part in the investigations.

"7. Arrest Maj. Voija Tankositch and the individual named Milan Ciganovitch.

"8. Prevent and punish the illegal traffic in arms and explosives.

"9. Send to Austria explanations of all unjustifiable utterances of high Serbian officials at home and abroad.

"10. Notify without delay that the above measures are executed. Reply before 6 p. m. on Saturday, July 25."

The answers to the 10 points may be summarized thus:

"1. Yes; will suppress all anti-Austrian publications.

"2. Yes; will suppress the Narodna Odbrana and similar societies.

"3. Yes; will expel all anti-Austrian teachers and teaching as soon as evidence is given.

"4. Yes; will expel all anti-Austrian officers and officials, if Austria will furnish names and acts of guilty persons.

"5. Yes; will accept collaboration of Austrian representatives in these proceedings, as far as consonant with principles of international law and criminal procedure and neighborly relations.

"6. Yes; will take the judicial proceedings; will also keep Austria informed; but can not admit the participation of Austrians in the judicial investigations, as this would be a violation of the constitution.

"7. Yes; have arrested Tankositch; ordered arrest of Ciganovitch.

"8. Yes; will suppress and punish traffic in arms and explosives.

"9. Yes; will deal with the said high officials, if Austria will supply evidence.

"10. Yes; will notify without delay.

"If this answer not satisfactory, Serbia will abide by decision of The Hague Tribunal."

Everybody felt that the Hapsburg note did not seek or contemplate honorable adjustment, but arbitrarily imposed impossible conditions and really meant war, as indeed it did, for in 48 hours Serbia was actually invaded.

The record shows that every possible effort was made by the authorities of England, through Lord Grey, by the authorities of France and of Russia, to reach an adjustment, and that it was the refusal of the German Emperor to cooperate with Lord Grey which led to the failure to avert the war on Serbia by Austria, which was instantly followed by the German Emperor issuing an order to mobilize and then declaring war on Russia and on France and the sudden and violent invasion of Belgium, Luxemburg, and France, and Russia; and the German and Austrian Emperors and their armies were prepared. Luxemburg was not prepared. Belgium was not prepared. France was not prepared. Great Britain had no army. Russia had no materials of war, had no factories, no adequate means of waging war. The fact that all the invaded countries were unprepared, and that the German Army had reached the highest point of its efficiency and preparedness, is the damning answer of all history to the shameless contention of the German leaders that they did not bring on this war, but that it was thrust on them. Let us thank God Himself that they have the decency to pay tribute to the love of justice and righteousness in the hearts of mankind by pretending, at least, that they are not responsible for this gigantic cataclysm in which all mankind is involved and the blood of all nations is being shed.

Here is a case where the house of Hapsburg and its military bureau, regardless of the Parliament of Austria-Hungary, regardless of public opinion of the people of Austria-Hungary, took a step to precipitate war on Servia on a few hours' notice, knowing it threatened a general European war, which, indeed, instantly followed.

Here is an example of where the house of Hohenzollern and its military bureau refused to cooperate in reaching an adjustment of the threatened war of Austria against Servia, which the leading powers of Europe earnestly endeavored to avoid in the hope of avoiding a general European war.

"ACTIONS SPEAK LOUDER THAN WORDS."

The German and Austrian Imperial Governments stand forever condemned by the judgment and conscience of mankind.

And then Germany, violating her plighted faith to Luxembourg for protection of neutrality, swept with violence the treaties aside, treated them as "scraps of paper," and drove her soldiers through Luxemburg in violation of the law of nations and of good faith. The same thing is true of Belgium. The German Government violated its faith to the nations of all the world. I have always regretted that the United States did not on that instant raise a strong protest against this violation of international law, although under the treaties and under the understandings of The Hague we were not called upon or expected to do it.

It will be remembered that it was the ambition of the house of Hohenzollern which led to the war between Prussia and France in 1870. The Hohenzollerns nominated a hereditary Hohenzollern prince to be King of Spain.

They wanted to be on both sides of France for "friendly" purposes, so that they could embrace France conveniently when the time was opportune. France naturally objected, and because of the excitement which it created in France the foreign office of France indicated to the King of Prussia, William I, that they would like to have an assurance that the French peace would not in the future be threatened in that way by the nomination of a Hohenzollern prince to take the Spanish crown. They had a right to ask that. Bismarck, the head of the military machine, the adviser of William I, changed the dispatch sent from the court of William I to Paris in such a way as to leave the impression of an insult to France, and in that way, by artfully playing upon the passions of the French King and upon his pride he was led to take the initial step. It is exactly as though a trained duelist would step on the foot of an innocent man and then, when the innocent man resented it, shoot him on the spot. That was the act of Bismarck. The French at that time were utterly unprepared; there was no order; there was perfect confusion. The Prussian military machine, in good working order, under Von Moltke, up to the last ounce of working efficiency, pounced upon France, besieged Paris, starved the people of Paris to utter exhaustion and surrender, and imposed an indemnity of 5,000,000,000 francs on the French people, and then, through the prestige gained by overwhelming unprepared France in that way, and through this gigantic fund, established the German Empire, with the hereditary absolute King of Prussia as the official Emperor of the German Empire. That is what occurred.

The Hohenzollerns have been active in putting princes of Hohenzollern blood on the thrones of adjacent kingdoms, as in Greece, and just as they proposed to do recently in establishing a kingdom of Poland.

They have been aiming to get control of the whole world. That is their real purpose.

Just as in recent times the peace of Europe has been overthrown by the Hohenzollerns and the Hapsburgs, so in the days of Frederick the Great Europe was kept in a turmoil by Frederick the Great and his military bureau.

The first act of Frederick's reign after writing his famous book "Anti-Machiavel," in which he denounced the dishonest doctrines of statecraft of Machiavelli, was to practice the craft of Machiavelli and violate the treaty of Prussia with Austria by invading and secretly entering the unarmed Province of Silesia with a large army. During the conquest of Silesia Frederick made a treaty with France, which he secretly betrayed by sending an authorized agreement to Austria, and which was accepted by Austria, in contravention with his obligations to France. Frederick then, having by this ruse obtained the evacuation of Silesia by Austria, promptly denied having authorized the agreement which Austria had accepted and by which he obtained the retirement of the Austrian troops.

The house of Hohenzollern should not be regarded merely as a dynasty; it is a dynasty interwoven with a gigantic military machine under the domination of the King of Prussia, who is ex officio Emperor of Germany and active commander in chief of the army and navy.

Germany is governed substantially by the military powers, who may illtreat the German subject with perfect impunity.

The German youth and the German citizen are taught from their childhood to regard their obligations to the army and the Kaiser as the first duty of good citizenship, and the ideals of the army have been in this way grafted in a large measure into public opinion of the German people, who have been led to believe that loyalty to Germany and the German people and loyalty to the Kaiser and his war machine are identical.

When William, therefore, under the pressure of his war machine, gave the order of mobilization, the citizens of Germany had no alternative except death but to seize their rifles and go to the trenches in an assault upon their neighbors.

There were 4,000,000 socialist voters who were thus forced into the ranks against all their principles of international brotherhood. They were driven through Belgium against their socialist brothers of Belgium, with unspeakable atrocities committed by the German soldiers; they were driven against France and Italy and Russia, against their socialist brethren, without any regard to their long-taught principles of international brotherhood. They could not help themselves. They had no power of organization. They dared not, under penalty of death, take the first step toward liberty. They were unhappily under the irresistible domination of Prussian militarism; under a monarchial autocratic structure of government which they had never been strong enough to change into a democratic government of the German people, by the German people, and for the German people.

Under a democracy or under a limited monarchy, with a responsible ministry and a parliament in control of government, this enormous disaster to the German people, to the Austrian people, to the people of all Europe, and to the people of America, and to the people of the world would not have occurred.

The world ought not to permit the recurrence of this gigantic disaster at any future time, and the only way in which to prevent its recurrence is that the world shall demand, as England is demanding, as England has demanded, as France has demanded, as Italy has demanded, as Russia and America are now demanding, the end of the warlike and irresponsible Government of Prussian militarism, the overthrow of the Hohenzollerns, and the establishment of a government truly responsible to the German people.

Mr. President, these considerations are far more important considerations justifying war against Prussian militarism by the people of the United States and by all the Republics on the face of the earth than even the murder of our citizens and the submarining of our ships, because the house of Hohenzollern and the house of Hapsburg are sworn and deadly enemies to the democracies of the world, and if they succeed in overthrowing the democratic people of France, England, Italy, and Russia this military machine would immediately make war on us, and with their millions and millions of trained and seasoned soldiers they might devastate America before we could organize our armies in adequate resistance.

I do not underestimate or ignore the tragedy upon tragedy which has attended the invasion of our international rights.

On the Lusitania, without warning, we had 114 American citizens murdered on the high seas in cold blood, in violation of international law.

On the Gulflight we had two Americans killed without warning.

Mr. President, it is one thing for an American citizen to be killed in a street fight in a foreign country, to be murdered in a foreign country by some irresponsible citizen or subject of a foreign country, and it is another thing when the responsible head of that Government commits murder on a single son of this Republic by or through executive, military, or naval orders.

On the Armenian we had 23 Americans killed;
On the Iberian we had 3 Americans killed;
On the Anglo-Californian we had 2 Americans killed;
On the Hesperian we had 1 American killed;
On the Arabic we had 3 Americans killed;
On the Persia we had 2 Americans destroyed;
On the Ancona we had 7 Americans killed;
On the Englishman we had 6 Americans killed;
On the Sabota we had 1 American killed;
On the Marina we had 8 Americans destroyed;
On the Russian we had 17 American citizens destroyed;
On the Eaveston we had 1 American destroyed;
On the Vedamore we had 10 Americans killed;
On the Turino we had 1 American killed;
On the Athos, 1 American killed;
On the Lacona, 8 Americans were lost;
On the Sjostad, 1 American killed;
On the Vigilancia, 5 Americans killed;
On the Healdton, 7 American were lost;
On the Crispin, 19 Americans were lost; and 18 of our American ships have been torpedoed, sunk, or burned by this submarine warfare, not to mention innumerable ships—over 700 ships—belonging to other neutral nations, and numbers of citizens of other neutral nations destroyed, because they had the courage to maintain their international rights on the high seas.

Our citizens have been ordered to keep out of and not to dare exercise their international rights on the high seas within an arbitrary zone a thousand miles long and fifteen hundred miles in the opposite direction surrounding Europe, where four-fifths of the commerce of the world must pass. We have been ordered that we shall not pass this line under penalty of death. That is military autocracy in action. Over 700 ships of neutral unoffending nations have been destroyed in violation of international law and neutral citizens innumerable murdered without notice to intimidate Great Britain and the world to a profitable peace for the Prussian military autocracy.

Under the international law the failure to maintain our neutral rights on the high seas under the threat of the Prussian military machine would be a violation of our neutrality, indeed, with other nations, who have the right to buy goods from us and have a right to ask the delivery of such goods in accordance with international law.

The United States has made every effort that it is possible for a self-respecting nation to make in the endeavor to avoid this war, and we have been unable to do it except at the sacrifice of our national rights, our national dignity, and our national honor.

It will be remembered that in the Spanish War the Imperial German Government furnished Spain with munitions of war and undertook to interfere with us in Manila Bay through her armed men-of-war.

It will be remembered that Germany attempted to interfere with Dewey in Manila Bay.

It will also be remembered that the battleships of Great Britain interposed and stopped interference of Germany with the rights of this great Republic, although I think that Dewey could have taken care of himself.

It will be remembered that the German Government sent munitions of war to Mexico to be used against America.

It will be remembered that the German Government undertook to invade Venezuela in violation of the Monroe doctrine.

It will be remembered that the Imperial German Government has distinguished itself by maintaining a fixed hostility to the Monroe doctrine.

It will be remembered that we were compelled to send the Austrian ambassador home, representing the Hapsburg war machine, for his conspiracies against our peace in the United States, when he, in conjunction with the agents of the Hohenzollern machine, were promoting the blowing up of American factories, filling our country with spies, promoting disloyalty in the United States, and stirring up the hostility of citizens of German extraction against our peace, and stirring up the activities of hundreds of thousands of German subjects, permitted by courtesy to reside in the United States, to interfere with our peace at home.

It will be remembered that the German agents have been stirring up disorders in Mexico, in Central and South America, and promoting war on our borders, and are now doing so at a very great expense to the United States.

That pernicious activity of the agents of Prussianism will go far to account for the things we have found difficult to understand; why the South American Republics did not feel more friendly to us in view of our sincere friendship for them; why little or no reciprocity. It was because the Hohenzollern agents persuaded those people that we had designs upon their peace and upon their property.

Perhaps the crowning offense against the United States was disclosed in the proposal of Zimmermann, representing the Prussian military machine, to make an alliance with Mexico at a time, January 19, 1917, when we were still at peace with the Imperial German Government, in which Zimmermann proposed to Mexico that Germany and Mexico would make war together on the United States and make peace together; that Germany would give Mexico general financial support and that Mexico should reconquer the lost territory of Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona; and that Japan should be invited to join Germany and Mexico in this war on the United States.

There was no alternative for the President of the United States, charged as he was with the protection of the people of the United States, informed as he was of all the things I have mentioned, and very many other things equally sinister and corroborative of the evil intent of the Imperial German Government against the United States, except to sever relations with the German Empire and to take up the gauge of battle flung into our teeth.

I agree with the President of the United States that it is a fearful thing to lead this great, peaceful people into war, and I also "appreciate that the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our heart—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of every peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free."

No treaty and no agreement with the Prussian military government or with the house of Hohenzollern is worth, or ever will be worth, the paper it is written on except where those who have the pledge have the military power to compel obedience to the promise. Their treaties are "scraps of paper." If they succeed in this war, they will attack us at their convenience.

I am pleased now that we join with those who are determined to establish liberty in the world. Together we shall establish the peace and happiness of mankind.

The world can not allow the Prussian military machine to succeed; otherwise their brutality would dominate the world.

I insert as an addenda to my remarks the brutality shown by the official orders of the German military machine in dealing with the peaceful, unoffending people of Belgium, whose neutrality they violated in willful disregard of their plighted faith to the people of Belgium.

Mr. President, I fervently pray with all my heart that the great, liberty-loving German people, who in their local affairs have developed such a high degree of representative self-government, will overthrow the house of Hohenzollern, whose wicked leadership has led them to this ruinous war and to the shambles. Whenever the German people establish a democracy—a representative "government of the people, by the people, and for the people"—the democracies of the world will no longer be unwilling to trust the Government of the German people. Treaties with republics are sacred; treaties with the Hohenzollerns and Hapsburgs are "scraps of paper." No assurances which the Hohenzollerns or the Hapsburgs can give to the democracies of the world are worthy of any faith or credit whatever, when against their fancied interest, as the history of the Hohenzollerns prove from Frederick the Second, of Prussia, down to the invasion of Luxemburg and Belgium.

Mr. President, the American people wish the happiness and the welfare of the German people and of the Austrian people as Americans wish the happiness of the British and the French and the Russian people. We wage our war not on the unhappy German people but on the military autocracy and on the house of Hohenzollern and the war machine that knows no conscience, no justice, no mercy, but can only be persuaded at the cannon's mouth. May the Lord of Hosts bless our arms and protect the liberties of mankind.

Mr. President, I found in a western paper a few days ago an editorial in the Muskogee Phoenix, Muskogee, Okla., written by Tams Bixby, Esq., former chairman of the Dawes Commission. It breathes a high, pure note of Christian patriotism, which I think deserves a place in our annals at this time. I wish to read it. It is very short. It is entitled:

ONWARD, CHRISTIAN SOLDIERS!

The United States of America, given to the world by the Pilgrim Fathers, through their love and devotion to the Omnipotent Ruler of the destinies of men, has declared war on the anniversary of our Savior's crucifixion.

It is altogether fitting and proper that it should be as it is. Loyal Americans will go forth to war not only as the champions of liberty and freedom and humanity but as soldiers of the cross. As He died upon the cross nearly 2,000 years ago for the salvation of mankind Americans will die upon the field of battle to make this a better world.

Through America's blood the world is to be purged of a barbaric, heathenish dynasty that in its lust has forgotten the teachings of our Savior. It is a noble thing to die and to suffer that men may be brought nearer to God.

America, unafraid, girded with the armor of righteousness, strides forth to battle. There is no hatred in our hearts; we bear no malice toward our enemies; we ask no conquest nor material reward. America, true to the traditions that gave her birth, is to wage a noble, Christian war. We are willing to die if need be to bring to all men once more the message of peace on earth, good will. And in this sacred hour America offers for her enemies the prayer of the cross, "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do."

The call to arms has been sounded. America, champion of righteousness, of civilization, and of Christianity, with a clear heart and willing hand, marches forth.

Amid the clamor and the cries of battle come the strains of the hymn of the united allies of mankind:

"Onward, Christian soldier!"

SCRAPS OF PAPER—GERMAN PROCLAMATIONS IN BELGIUM AND FRANCE.

[With a foreword by Ian Malcolm, M. P.]

FOREWORD.

There are some things which the human imagination can not fully picture, and the horrors of war are, perhaps fortunately, among them. Even those who have lived through the past two years at the front tell me that they can not believe all that they have seen; how much less can we at home grasp the grim realities of war and of German invasion, we whose knowledge is perforce drawn only from the reading of books.

The following pages contain reproductions of a series of inhuman documents, the careful perusal of which may do something to supplement our existing information concerning the actual conditions under which hundreds of thousands of our gallant allies are now living—if "living" be the appropriate word to denote so precarious an existence. Ill-informed persons in this country have been heard to say: "Would it much matter if we were under German rule?" I am inclined to think that they would not be disposed to repeat that question if they clearly understood the meaning of some of these threatening and brutal proclamations.

Such documents require no explanation and no comment. They are reduced photographic facsimiles of posters and placards, pasted by the Germans on the walls of cities, towns, and villages in invaded France and Flanders. The originals are in my possession.

Let the reader imagine himself to be studying anyone of these, when he suddenly finds it affixed to the door of his private house or his church or his town hall; he may then be able to enter more fully into the feelings of those who, for two long years, have been subject to a reign of terror; and to appreciate the patience, as well as the endurance, with which these people are watching for the return of freedom.

IAN MALCOLM.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, London, S. W.

TO THE BELGIAN PEOPLE.

It is to my very great regret that the German troops find themselves compelled to cross the Belgian frontier. They are acting under the constraint of an unavoidable necessity, Belgium's neutrality having been violated by French officers who, in disguise, crossed Belgian territory by motor car in order to make their way into Germany.

Belgians!

It is my greatest wish that there may still be a way of avoiding a conflict between two nations which have hitherto been friends, and at one time even allies.

Remember the glorious days of Waterloo, where German arms played their part in founding and establishing the independence and prosperity of your country. But we must have a free passage. The destruction of bridges, of tunnels, and of railways will have to be looked upon as hostile acts.

Belgians!

It is for you to choose! I hope the German Army of the Meuse will not be forced to fight you. A free passage for attack is all we desire.

I give formal pledges to the Belgian population that it will have nothing to suffer from the horrors of war, that we will pay in gold for the provisions that must be taken from the country, and that our soldiers will prove themselves the best of friends to a people for whom we feel the highest esteem and the greatest sympathy. It rests with your good sense and with an intelligent patriotism to save your country from the horrors of war.

The general officer commanding the army of the Meuse,

VON EMMICH.

THE VIOLATION OF BELGIUM.

This proclamation was distributed by the German Army among the Belgian civil population on August 4, 1914. This was the day they violated Belgian neutrality, and they still hoped that the Belgian Army would offer no resistance. But when Belgian troops checked their advance that afternoon at the passage of the Meuse, they changed their tone and wreaked their revenge on the Belgian civilians. At Warsage, the village where this proclamation had been scattered by the Uhlans, 3 civilians were shot, 6 hanged, 9 others murdered in various ways, and 25 houses were burnt down.

ORDER TO THE PEOPLE OF LIÉGE.

The population of Andenne, after making a display of peaceful intentions toward our troops, attacked them in the most treacherous manner. With my authorization the general commanding these troops has reduced the town to ashes and has had 110 persons shot.

I bring this fact to the knowledge of the people of Liége in order that they may know what fate to expect should they adopt a similar attitude.

GEN. VON BULOW.

LIÉGE, August 22, 1914.

TERRORIZATION.

Two hundred and fifty civilians—men, women, and children—were killed by the Germans at Andenne on August 20 and 21, 1914, and 50 at Seilles, on the opposite bank of the Meuse. A hundred and fifty-three houses were burned at Seilles and 37 at Andenne. It is not true that the Germans were attacked by the civil population or that they received any provocation whatever. The murder and arson were started in cold blood, at a signal; the object was to give point to such a proclamation as this.

As a warning to Liége, however, the atrocities at Andenne were superfluous. The Liégeois had already had personal experience of German terrorism, for on that very night of August 20, again at a given signal, the Germans had burned 55 houses at Liege and murdered 29 civilians—shooting some, bayoneting others, and burnings others alive.

NOTICE TO THE MAYOR—REQUISITION ORDER.

The commune of Luneville will furnish by September 1, 1914, under penalty of a fine of 300,000 francs in case of refusal or opposition—

1. One hundred thousand cigars or 200,000 cigarettes or 5,000 kilos of tobacco.
2. Fifty thousand liters of wine (in cask or in bottle).
3. One thousand kilos of tea or of cocoa.
4. Ten thousand kilos of sugar.
5. One thousand kilos of roasted coffee.
6. One thousand woolen stockings.
7. A quantity of soap, of toilet paper or cut paper, and a great number of pocket handkerchiefs and of knives.
8. Ten kilos of glycerine.
9. Ten kilos of grease.

I expressly add that all the goods demanded must be of the best quality, and that in all cases where they are not so the commune will be held responsible. All appeals against this order will be null and void.

VON FASBENDER.
Officer Commanding First Bavarian Reserve Corps.

CHION, August 29, 1914.

REQUISITIONS.

The best commentary on this proclamation is the Hague convention of 1907, concerning the laws and customs of war on land. The following articles may be singled out for quotation:

"52. Requisitions in kind and services shall not be demanded from the local authorities or inhabitants, except for the needs of the army of occupation. They shall be in proportion to the resources of the country. * * *

"53. An army of occupation shall only take possession of cash, funds, and realizable securities which are strictly the property of the State. * * *"

At Lunéville the Germans blew up with dynamite the walls of private houses into which safes had been let. They were directed by a non-commissioned officer who had done business in Lunéville before the war and knew which safes were worth blasting out. (Report of the French Commission on German Atrocities, I, pp. 25–26, French original; 21–22, English translation.)

NOTICE TO THE POPULATION.

On the 25th of August, 1914, inhabitants of Luneville made an attack by ambush on German columns and ammunition trains. On the same day inhabitants also fired on ambulances bearing the Red Cross. Shots were also fired on German wounded and on a military hospital containing a German ambulance unit.

On account of these acts of hostility an indemnity of 650,000 francs is imposed on the commune of Luneville. The mayor is ordered to pay over this sum on the 6th September, 1914, at 9 o'clock in the morning, to the representative of the German military authorities. Fifty thousand francs of the payment must be made in specie. All appeals will be considered null and void. No postponement will be granted.

If the commune does not punctually execute the order to pay this sum of 650,000 francs, all goods that can be distrained upon will be seized.

In case of nonpayment, house-to-house visits will be made and all the inhabitants will be searched. Any person who has deliberately concealed money or tried to withhold goods from seizure by the military authorities, or who attempts to leave the town, will be shot.

The mayor and the hostages taken by the military authorities will be made responsible for the exact execution of the above orders. The mayor is ordered to publish these directions to the commune immediately.

VON FASBENDER,
General Commanding.

HENAMENIL, September 3, 1914.

PUNISHMENT TO PROVE CRIME.

The motive of the present proclamation is found in the German military maxim that "Punishment is a proof of crime." The heinous charges made in the first paragraph against the inhabitants of Luneville are just as false as those trumped up against the Belgian civilians of Andenne and Liege a few days earlier. The truth in all these cases was that the Germans had committed atrocities in cold blood, on a given signal, for a deliberate purpose of terrorization. At Luneville there were 18 victims (including a boy of 12 shot and a woman of 98 bayoneted), and 70 houses were burned. Such incidents require explanation, and the Germans, true to their policy of the offensive, hoped to fix the guilt on their victims before it could be brought home to themselves.

PROCLAMATION.

Inhabitants of both sexes are strictly forbidden to leave their houses so far as this is not absolutely necessary for making short rounds in order to buy provisions or water their cattle. They are absolutely forbidden to leave their houses at night under any circumstances whatever.

Whoever attempts to leave the place, by night or day, upon any pretext whatever will be shot.

Potatoes can only be dug with the commandant's consent and under military supervision.

The German troops have orders to carry out these directions strictly, by sentinels and patrols, who are authorized to fire on anyone departing from these directions.

THE GENERAL COMMANDING.

THE STRONG HAND.

This proclamation imposes restrictions upon the people of Luneville which barely allow them to keep themselves alive, while the penalty for infraction is death by shooting, at the discretion of the German sentinels and patrols.

These restrictions are the German general staff's ideal of the state to which conquered peoples should be reduced. This process of terrorization is carried out in two stages: First comes the crushing blow—the carefully planned outbreak of murder, rape, arson, and pillage similar to that which was contrived at Luneville on August 25, 1914. Then, when the victims are presumed to be sufficiently paralyzed in action and broken in spirit, they are bound down with a network of drastic regulations to prevent their recuperation.

At Luneville, fortunately, the process was cut short. The Germans only occupied the town three weeks, and were driven out by the French Army on September 11.

NOT TO BE REMOVED—GERMAN MILITARY AUTHORITIES.

The mayor of the town of Luneville officially requests the inhabitants, under the sanction of the most severe penalties, to abstain from making any signals to aeroplanes or other details of the French Army.

It would be very imprudent, even out of simple curiosity, to follow too attentively the maneuvers of the aircraft that fly over Luneville or to try to communicate with the French outposts.

The immediate steps to enforce this, which would be taken by Col. Lidl, commandant of the communications depot, would consist in the seizure of a considerable number of hostages from the working class as well as from the middle class.

In order to prevent or repress criminal behavior in war time, as well as to insure the security of the German troops and the civil population, the special police stations flying a white flag are to receive, day and night, all communications which may be addressed to them on this subject.

KELLER,
The Mayor of Luneville.

HOSTAGES.

In the present proclamation the mayor of Luneville is made to warn his fellow citizens against rendering any assistance to their own national forces. The threat to take hostages in case of disobedience is very properly underlined. To be seized as a hostage in the invaded districts of Belgium and France was almost equivalent to a sentence of death. Hostages who were not shot by their captors or driven under the fire of their fellow countrymen as living screens were often deported to prison camps in Germany for an indefinite period and exposed to a more lingering death by exposure, starvation, and brutality.

PROCLAMATION TO THE INHABITANTS OF ST. DIE.

The Government of the French Republic has sent its troops over the German frontier to come to the help of Russia.

I know well how unpopular this war is in France and how it has been forced upon you by your government against the considered will of the country.

It is now for arms to decide.

European civilization as defended by Germany and Austria against the Serbs and the Russians, who are protectors of political murder, and the well-known German discipline are the guarantees that our arms will only be directed against the military forces. All noncombatants may be sure that they will not suffer interference either with their persons or their property so long as they remain quiet.

The German Armies have made their entry into France.

Although we will respect the liberty of noncombatants, we have at the same time decided to repress with the gratest energy and without mercy any act of hostility committed against German troops.

The following will be immediately shot:

All persons guilty of any act of hostility against a member of the German Army.

All the inhabitants and proprietors of houses in which Frenchmen belonging to the army, or persons firing on our troops, may be found, unless these facts, or the presence of suspected persons, have been announced to the local command immediately after the entry of our troops.

Any persons who try to help or who have helped the enemy's forces, or who try to harm or have harmed our armies in any way whatever, especially by cutting the telephone and telegraph wires.

Anyone who tears down these notices.

The following will be held responsible for acts of hostility by the population: The curé, the mayor, the mayor's assessor, and the schoolmasters.

All buildings will be burnt in which or from which acts of hostility have been committed. In case of repetition the whole town will be destroyed and burnt. Besides which, it is ordered that:

(1) All arms (guns, pistols, revolvers, brownings, sabres, etc.) are to be deposited with the local command from the moment of entry of our troops.

(2) All traffic in the streets is forbidden between 8 in the evening and 6 in the morning. The sentinels will fire without challenging on every individual disobeying this order.

(3) All gatherings of more than three persons are forbidden.

(4) It is forbidden to ring the bells or communicate with the enemy by any means whatever.

(5) The curé, the mayor, the mayor's assessor and the schoolmasters are to present themselves immediately after the entry of our troops before the local command, which reserves to itself the right to retain them as hostages for the execution of the above stipulations in regard to them.

(6) It is forbidden to approach on any pretext the sick, wounded, or dead belonging to our armies, or the prisoners of war who are under the protection of our armies.

(7) All persons infringing the above rules or committing any reprehensible act against our authorities or any of their representatives will be punished according to German martial law.

THE GENERAL COMMANDING,
KNOERZER.

ST. DIE, August 27, 1914.

HOW TO TERRORIZE A TOWN.

This proclamation posted at St. Die (Vosges) is a very complete example of German style in this vein of literature.

First, a self-glorificatory version of the origin of the war; second, a misleading promise of security to the civil population, like the proclamation at Warsage—the voice of the wolf addressing the lamb; third, the threat of wholesale fire and slaughter breathed out against this same civil population if the German Army is in any way incommoded by anybody in its conduct of war—the commune and the communal authorities to pay a collective penalty of the last severity for any alleged infringement of the proclamation by an individual; and, last, a network of minute regulations and restrictions to perpetuate the effect of the sweeping threats that precede. In their conception of their victims' psychology the Germans betray their own.

NOTICE.

The numerous acts of hostility committed by the inhabitants of this country against the German troops force me to give the following orders:

1. Any inhabitant who shall be guilty of an act of hostility against a member of the German Army, or any inhabitant of a house from which our troops are fired upon, will immediately be shot and the house of the guilty person will instantly be burned.

2. All arms (rifles, pistols, sabers, etc.) must be deposited by 4 o'clock at the town hall. Whoever retains arms or hides in his house any members of the French Army will be punished according to the laws of war.

3. All traffic in the streets is forbidden during the night from 8 o'clock in the evening to 7 o'clock in the morning. The sentinels have orders to fire without challenging them on all persons who do not obey these orders.

4. All gatherings in the streets are forbidden.

5. It is further forbidden to ring the bells, or to communicate with the enemy, by means of optical signals, lanterns, or other methods of conveying intelligence. In case of disobedience the offenders will be punished by death. The same penalty will be inflicted on those who destroy any means of communication.

It is likewise forbidden to leave the town under any pretext whatever without being exposed to the same penalties as are mentioned above.

THE GENERAL COMMANDING.

SAINT-DIE, August 28, 1914.

TWO KINDS OF GERMAN OFFICER.

In this proclamation the German commandant sees fit to repeat his warnings and prohibitions of the day before.

A comparison of the two proclamations reveals a deterioration in the commandant's nerves in the course of the intervening night. The civil population of Belgium, France, and Poland has paid a heavy price for the German Army's nervousness. A criminal is never more dangerous than when he is afraid.

*But there was another German officer at St. Die who had a cooler head. When the French and German troops were fighting from house to house for the possession of the town this German officer placed three civilians on chairs in the street, to screen his men from the French troops' fire. He claims that this "brilliant idea" was responsible for the German conquest of St. Die. "The civilians were killed by French bullets * * *. One becomes terribly callous at this business * * ."
(Letter from this officer, Lieut. Eberlein, published in the Munchener Neueste Nachrichten (Vorabendblatt), 7th October, 1914.)

PROCLAMATION.

All functionaries of the French Government and of the municipality are informed as follows:

(1) All peaceable inhabitants will be able to follow their regular occupations in complete security without interference. Private property will be absolutely respected by the German troops. Supplies of all kinds serving the requirements of the German troops, especially provisions, will be paid for in cash.

(2) If, on the contrary, the population should dare to take part in any way whatever, openly or secretly, in hostilities against our troops, the most severe punishments will be inflicted on the guilty.

All firearms are to be deposited immediately at the town hall. Any individual found in arms will be put to death. Any person cutting or attempting to cut telegraph or telephone wires, destroying railway lines, bridges or high roads, or committing any action detrimental to the German troops will be shot summarily.

Any towns or villages, the inhabitants of which may take part in the fighting against our troops, fire at our baggage or at our supply columns, or lay an ambush for German soldiers, will be set on fire and the guilty persons immediately shot.

The civil authorities alone are in a position to save the inhabitants from the terrors and scourges of war.

It is they who will be responsible for the unavoidable consequences of disregarding this proclamation.

VON MOLTKE,
Chief of the General Staff of the German Army.

EPERNAY, September 4, 1914.

CHIEF OF STAFF VON MOLTKE AND SUPERINTENDENT KAHN.

This proclamation contains the same promises, prohibitions, and threats as those which precede. Its interest lies in the signature of Gen. von Moltke, at that time chief of the German general staff, and therefore supreme executive head of the German military forces.

In spite of his exalted rank, Gen. von Moltke failed to bring his subordinates' action into conformity with his own laudable intentions, as a comparison between this proclamation and the following will show:

On September 4, 1914, the general assured the people of Epernay that "private property will be respected by the German troops, and that supplies of all kinds serving the requirements of the German Army, especially provisions, will be paid for in cash." But for the sequel see the next page.

MUNICIPAL COUNCIL OF EPERNAY—OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE EXTRAORDINARY SESSION OF SATURDAY, THE 5TH SEPTEMBER, 1914.

In the year one thousand nine hundred and fourteen, on Saturday, the 5th of September, at a quarter past nine o'clock in the evening,

The Municipal Council of the Town of Epernay, duly summoned, met at the Town Hall, under the presidency of M. Maurice Pol-Roger, the mayor, for the holding of an extraordinary session necessitated by a requisition made by the German Commissariat.

There were present—

MM. 1. Maurice Pol-Roger; 2. Eugène Jacquet, first assessor; 3. Perrault, assessor; 4. Gallice; 5. Cerveaux; 6. Fleuricourt; 7. Lemaître; 8. Villiot; 9. Brunette; 10. Michelot; 11. Edouard Boizel; 12. Gaullier; 13. Granier; 14. Waline; 15. Machet; 16. Doctor Chapt.

Absent—

MM. 1. J. Chandon; 2. Chaurey; 3. Dépuiset, serving. MM. Geoffroy and Raulet, excused attendance. MM. 1. Moineau; 2. Bource; 3. Ch. Dubois.

Summoned to this meeting and present—

MM. Ernest Goubault, Edmo Goubault, Claude Chandon.

The mayor communicated the following document:

"Epernay, the 5th September, 1914.

"At the request of the mayor, we certify that the commissariat of the Royal Bodyguard has imposed a fine (according to convention) on the town of Epernay amounting to 176,550 francs, payable on the 6th of September, at noon, for not having delivered in time the provisions necessary for the troops.

"In the name of the Commissariat of the Royal Guard,
"(Signed) KAHN, Director."

The president read the details of the provisions demanded:

"For the 5th of September, 1914—
"Oats	120,000	kilogrammes.
"Bread	21,000	"
"Roasted coffee	500	"
"Preserved vegetables, mushrooms, and semolina	10,000	"
"Salted bacon, lard, &c	12,000	" "

He then pointed out that only the required quantity of salted bacon could not be supplied; there were only about 2,000 kilogrammes available, and that, in spite of all his endeavours, he had not been able to obtain either the items of the sum claimed or any reduction in the amount of the fine.

In default of payment of this sum the German authorities threatened to take the most rigorous proceedings against the population itself, and to conduct forcible perquisitions in the houses of the inhabitants.

A long discussion arose on this subject.

Finally, being unable to resist the demands of the German Commissariat, and on account of the threats made, the council decided that to-morrow morning an appeal should be made for the cooperation of the people of this town to collect the sum of 176,550 francs. The session closed at 11.30 in the evening.

(Signed) MACHET, BRUNETTE.

N. B.—Payment has been deferred to 5.30 p. m. instead of noon.

He was evidently unaware that one Kahn, superintendent of the commissariat of the Prussian guard, was at that moment demanding a quantity of salt bacon from the town, which the town was utterly unable to furnish, and imposing a monetary fine of 176,550 francs for the default in the amount produced, under the threat of "taking the most rigorous proceedings against the population itself and conducting forcible perquisitions in the houses of the inhabitants."

NOTICE TO THE POPULATION.

In order sufficiently to insure the safety of our troops and the tranquillity of the population of Reims, the persons mentioned have been seized as hostages by the commander of the German Army. These hostages will be shot if there is the least disorder. On the other hand, if the town remains perfectly calm and quiet, these hostages and inhabitants will be placed under the protection of the German Army.

THE GENERAL COMMANDING.

REIMS, September 12, 1914.

"TO INSURE THE TRANQUILLITY OF THE POPULATION OF REIMS."

What is the meaning of "the least disorder"? By the terms of the proclamation the interpretation of these words was to mean life or death to the hostages whose names (80 in number, with a note that others had been taken as well) were published on another poster pasted up beneath. The phrase can hardly have inspired tranquillity in the hostages themselves; it had too formidable an elasticity. At Aerschot, on August 19, a German soldier had fired in the air; at Dinant, on August 23, French soldiers had fired at German soldiers in open warfare; at Louvain, on August 25, German soldiers had fired on one another; and in each case the "disorder" had been punished by the massacre of the civil population. For the hostages at Rheims these were not tranquilizing precedents.

NOTICE.

The persons mentioned below were condemned by the tribunal of the council of war and shot this same day at the citadel, namely: Eugène Jacquet, wholesale wine merchant; Ernest Deconinck, sublieutenant; Georges Maertens, tradesman; Sylvère Verhulst, workman; (1) for having concealed the English aviator who alighted at Wattignies on the 11th of last March; for having given him shelter and facilitated his passage to France so that he was able to return to the enemy's lines; (2) for having maintained and assisted members of the enemy army who, after discarding their uniform, remained in Lille and its suburbs, and having enabled them to escape into France.

By the proclamation of the governor, of the 7th of April, 1915, these two cases, being considered as espionage, are brought to the knowledge of the public in order that they may serve as a warning.

THE GOVERNOR.

LILLE, September 22, 1915.

"CONSIDERED AS ESPIONAGE."

Espionage is punishable with death—that is a commonly acknowledged rule of military law. But there are other services which the civil population of an occupied territory may perform, and be impelled by all the claims of patriotism and humanity to perform, for their allies and follow-countrymen under arms, which are absolutely distinct from espionage, of infinitely less danger to the occupying power, and undeserving of the death penalty by all the traditions of civilized warfare.

The Germans wished to punish these acts of service with the extreme penalty. They therefore "considered them as espionage," shot four patriotic citizens of Lille who had been guilty of performing them, and posted this proclamation in order to leave no one in doubt that they intended to repeat this action at the next opportunity.

PROCLAMATION.

In future the inhabitants of places situated near railways and telegraph lines which have been destroyed will be punished without mercy (whether they are guilty of this destruction or not). For this purpose hostages have been taken in all places in the vicinity of railways in danger of similar attacks, and at the first attempt to destroy any railway, telegraph, or telephone line they will be shot immediately.

VON DER GOLTZ,
The Governor.

BRUSSELS, October 5, 1914.

"THE INNOCENT SHALL SUFFER."

In this proclamation the German governor general of Belgium announces that he will shoot Belgian civilians "without mercy" if certain acts are committed, "whether they are guilty of those acts or not." This announcement would have been still more startling if he had added that no guilt attached to these acts at all, and that they were done by the Belgian Army as legitimate acts of war.

From August 19, 1914, when the Belgian Army retired within the lines of Antwerp, to October 9, when Antwerp fell, it carried on the war by making sorties through the German lines and by sending out patrols, many miles behind them, to cut the German communications. This warfare was as effective as it was legitimate, and it was its effectiveness that made the German authorities shrink from no means of bringing it to a stop.

The means announced in this proclamation are characteristic. Innocent civilians were to suffer—not for guilty civilians, for there were none—but for their compatriots in the Belgian Army whom the Germans could not cope with by other tactics than these.

PROCLAMATION.

The tribunal of the Imperial German council of war sitting in Brussels has pronounced the following sentences:

Condemned to death for conspiring together to commit treason: Edith Cavell, teacher, of Brussels; Philippe Bancq, architect, of Brussels; Jeanne de Belleville, of Montignies; Louise Thuliez, professor, at Lille; Louis Severin, chemist, of Brussels; Albert Libiez, lawyer, of Mons.

For the same offense the following have been condemned to 15 years' hard labor: Hermann Capiau, engineer, of Wasmes; Ada Bodart, of Brussels; Georges Derveau, chemist, of Pâturages; Mary de Croy, of Bellignies.

At the same sitting the war council condemned 17 others charged with treason against the imperial armies to sentences of penal servitude and imprisonment varying from two to eight years.

The sentences passed on Bancq and Edith Cavell have already been fully executed.

The governor general of Brussels brings these facts to the knowledge of the public that they may serve as a warning.

Gen. VON BISSING,
The Governor of the City.

BRUSSELS, October 12, 1915.

THE "TREASON" OF EDITH CAVELL.

Treason means the opposite of patriotism, but the German word "war-treason" means loyalty to patriotism at the risk of one's life. Acts of war-treason are acts done by the inhabitants of an occupied territory, on behalf of their native country and their fellow countrymen, for which the German military code prescribes the penalty of death. Edith Cavell and her companions had done such acts and well knew what awaited them if they were discovered. It was in this that their heroism lay. But the German Government knew, on its part, that whatever it might lay down in its military code, the execution of Edith Cavell for what she had done was an outrage which would arouse the indignation of the civilized world. That is why, during the whole course of her trial and to within a few hours of putting her to death, the German authorities at Brussels kept the American Legation at arm's length by procrastinations, prevarications, and lies. When intervention was no longer possible, they hastened to proclaim their achievement to the population of Brussels, for, as the German under secretary for foreign affairs, Herr Zimmermann, explained to an American journalist, "the sentence had been carried out to frighten those who might presume on their sex to take part in enterprises punishable with death."

PROCLAMATION OF THE GERMAN MILITARY COMMANDANT OF LILLE.

The attitude of England makes the provisioning of the population more and more difficult.

To reduce the misery, the German authorities have recently asked for volunteers to go and work in the country. This offer has not had the success that was expected.

In consequence of this the inhabitants will be deported by order and removed into the country. Persons deported will be sent to the interior of the occupied territory in France, far behind the front, where they will be employed in agricultural labor, and not in any military work whatever. By this measure they will be given the opportunity of providing better for their subsistence.

In case of necessity provisions can be obtained through the German depots. Every person deported will be allowed to take with him 30 kilogrammes of luggage (household utensils, clothes, etc.), which they will be well advised to make ready at once.

I order, therefore, that no one may, until further order, change his place of residence. No one may absent himself from his legally declared residence from 9 p. m. to 6 a. m. (German time), unless he is in possession of a permit in due form.

Inasmuch as this is an irrevocable measure, it is in the interest of the population itself to remain calm and obedient.

THE COMMANDANT.

LILLE, April, 1916.

THE DEPORTATIONS FROM LILLE.

This proclamation was followed up by the deportation of 25,000 French civilians from the towns of Roubaix, Turcoing, and Lille. There were girls as young as 16 among the victims and men as old as 55. Families were ruthlessly broken up.

The first batches were obtained by sporadic slave raids in the streets and houses. Then the garrison of Lille was reinforced, and on April 22, 1916 (Holy Saturday), the first systematic deportation was carried out. "About 3 in the morning, troops with fixed bayonets barred the streets, machine guns commanded the roads—against unarmed people. Soldiers made their way into the houses, the officer pointed out the people who were to go, and half an hour later everybody was marched pell-mell into an adjacent factory, and from there to the station, whence the departure took place." French Yellow Book: Memorandum of June 30, 1916, by the minister of war (based on documentary evidence).

Only a part of the exiles were employed on agriculture in the occupied territory. Others, contrary to the German promise and contrary to every recognized concept of justice, were compelled to do work of a military nature for the advantage of the German Army.

NOTICE.

(French text.)

All the inhabitants of the house, with the exception of children under 14 and their mothers, and also of old people, must prepare themselves for transportation in an hour and a half's time.

An officer will definitely decide which persons will be taken to the concentration camps. For this purpose all the inhabitants of the house must assemble in front of it. In case of bad weather they may remain in the passage. The door of the house must remain open. All appeals will be useless. No inmate of the house, even those who will not be transported, may leave the house before 8 a. m.—German time.

Each person will have a right to 30 kilograms of luggage; if anyone's luggage exceeds that weight, it will all be rejected without further consideration. Packages must be separately made up for each person and must bear an address legibly written and firmly fixed on. This address must include the surname and the Christian name and the number of the identity card.

It is absolutely necessary that people should provide themselves in their own interest with eating and drinking utensils, as well as with a woollen blanket, strong shoes, and linen. Everyone must carry his identity card on his person. Anyone attempting to evade transportation will be punished without mercy.

ETAPPEN-KOMMANDANTUR.

(The "Etappen" are the German military depots on the lines of communication.)

LILLE, April, 1916.

"AN HOUR AND A HALF'S NOTICE."

In this proclamation the German transport officer at Lille puts the commandant's decree into effect. He allows the exiles an hour and a half to settle their affairs and leave their homes for an unknown destination. "Anyone attempting to evade deportation will be punished without pity."

*"It was terrible," writes a witness. (French Yellow Book, Ann. 13.) "The officer went round, pointing out the men and women whom he chose and giving them, to make their preparations, a period varying from an hour to ten minutes. * * **

*"They left Madame X. the choice between her two servants. She chose the elder one. 'Good,' they answered, 'that is the one we will take.' * * **

*"Madame D. took the place of her maid, who was ill. When she was sent back she wanted to stay. They threatened to send her back forcibly. * * **

"The concentration camps looked like slave markets."

INHABITANTS OF THE DISTRICT OF LILLE!

In refusing to execute military work imposed by the enemy, you are within your rights and doing your duty as Frenchmen. The Hague convention, ratified by all civilized nations, justifies your action. The disloyal citizens who accept work of military value, direct or indirect, will commit a serious crime against their country. They will, moreover, expose themselves to the rigor of the law when the French flag waves again over Lille.

That time is not far off.

The strength of the allies increases steadily; that of Germany, on the contrary, is becoming exhausted as the time passes. It will very soon not be equal to the task.

Everything bids you hope.

Courage and confidence through all.

THE SPIRIT OF FRANCE.

This proclamation is a noble answer to the last. It was scattered in Lille in defiance of the German authorities, and breathes the spirit that Germany can never conquer.

*"Our people," writes an inhabitant of Lille (French Yellow Book, Ann. 13), "preserved their calm and their dignity admirably. They all started off with cries of 'Vive la France!' 'Vive la liberté!' and singing the Marseillaise. They comforted those who were left behind, their poor weeping mothers and the children. Pale with grief and choked with tears, they forbade them to weep. They did not weep themselves * * ."

*"Our soldiers at the front must not avenge us by similar acts; that would sully the fair name of France. Let them leave it to God to avenge such crimes * * ."

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

WASHINGTON RAILWAY & ELECTRIC CO.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico in the chair). Upon the suggestion of the Vice President the Chair appoints Senators HUGHES, POMERENE, PITTMAN, DILLINGHAM, and HARDING as the committee to make the investigation, in accordance with Senate resolution No. 23, which was adopted this morning.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am always willing to perform any duty the Senate may impose upon me, but I am a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and we have a matter of contest pending before that committee now, depending, of course, upon what the committee may recommend to the Senate and what the Senate may afterwards instruct the committee to do. I feel that I have about all the committee work that I can undertake at this session, and I ask to be excused for that reason.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will bear in mind the request of the Senator from Ohio and will reserve the matter for a few moments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER subsequently said:

In view of the request of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] he will be excused and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] will be appointed to serve upon the committee provided for in resolution No. 23.

EXPORTS TO NEUTRAL COUNTRIES.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask for the consideration of Senate resolution No. 32, which is now on the table. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Chair lays before the Senate resolution numbered 32, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution S. Res. 32, submitted by Mr. KING on the 12th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce be, and is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate a statement of the exports from the United States to the neutral countries of Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, and Switzerland since the opening of the European war in August, 1914; that said statement include specifications as to the quantity, value, and classification of said exports; and that the Secretary of Commerce be, and is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate a statement of the same scope and specifications covering exports from the United States to said neutral countries for the period of two years prior to August 1, 1914; also that the Secretary of Commerce be requested to furnish such data as may be available to him bearing upon the question as to what proportion of the exports to such neutral countries during the period of said war found their way into Germany or Austria-Hungary.

Mr. KING. I move to amend the resolution by striking out, in lines 2, 9, and 13, the word "requested" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "directed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I have no objection to the adoption of the resolution, but I have received a number of communications from shippers in New York in relation to this matter. I have one that I believe will be of very great interest to the Senate and also to the public generally throughout the country. I shall ask permission to insert the letter just at this point in the RECORD, so that it may be considered by Senators in reading the proceedings of to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

NEW YORK, April 13, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM M. CALDER,
Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

SIR: As one of your constituents engaged in the steamship business, as an agent of the Norwegian America Line, I desire to call your attention to the inequity of placing an embargo on exports to Norway, as it appears to be Senator KING'S idea, in view of his resolution introduced yesterday, calling upon the Secretary of Commerce to furnish your honorable body with data on the export from this country into Germany and Prussia through Scandinavian countries.

Being thoroughly familiar with the situation as to Norwegian exports, I wish to state that while during the early part of the war considerable of our exports may have been passed through Norway into the central powers, I can state with absolute assurance that during the past year nothing has gone through, for the following reasons:

1. The shipper, in order to make shipment, has to secure what is called a letter of assurance from the trade department of the British Embassy, which letter is issued only after the British foreign office has investigated the consignee and through the local British consul secured satisfactory guaranties, backed by indemnities, that the goods he desires to import will not be reexported in any shape whatsoever to any of the powers allied against Great Britain.

2. The control exercised by Great Britain through the issuance of these letters of assurance have so restricted the quantity of commodities necessary to the barest amount of actual consumption.

3. Through the necessity of steamers carrying cargoes to Norway having to call at a British port, or as at present the Canadian port of Halifax, where manifests and letters of assurance are carefully scrutinized, there is no possibility of the shipper fictitiously describing his shipment with the idea of violating any of the principles involved in this British control system. So much for the question of actual consumption in Norway of the goods shipped to that country.

The question of necessity next arises, as Norway is not self-supporting, and, of course, prior to the war received imports from European countries of approximately about sixteen times the value of the imports received from the United States, so it would be decidedly unfair to compare the exports from this country of the years prior to the war with the present exports, as the European countries are absolutely closed to Norway, who is at present compelled to buy all of her steel and iron and manufactures of same in this country which were secured from Germany up to last year.

As to foodstuffs, this is the only market in which Norway can obtain supplies. The Norwegian sentiment, as far as I can ascertain, is proally. The regulations and laws passed by Norway strictly prohibit the exportation from that country of any goods imported into it, and I understand that there has been over 100 merchants placed in jail for a violation of the regulations relative to exporting of their products, which were clandestinely sent to Germany.

It would be well also to consider the local effect of such an embargo, since flour and cereals comprise approximately 50 to 60 per cent of our cargoes. It is my fear that if a step is taken in establishing an embargo upon foodstuffs later action will be taken to embargo all shipments. It must be considered that if all shipments are embargoed it will be a great hardship to a number of manufacturers, as the automobile industry is securing a wonderful footing in Norway, and the same applies to the question of cotton, prints, shirts, hosiery, and various other articles which prior to the war our manufacturers had no opportunity to ship, or apparently were unwilling to enter the export field. It would simply paralyze these new lines of business.

To bring the matter closer home, it would also have a serious effect upon our South Brooklyn community, as we are using upon our Thirtieth Street Pier anywhere from two to five hundred men weekly in the loading and discharging of the Norwegian-American Line vessels, and my greatest argument is upon the basis of the necessity of protecting in so far as possible your constituents.

I can only secure at the moment approximate figures, but I understand that the total exports from all ports of the United States to Norway during the past year approximate $175,000,000, which is only about equal to the present fortnightly clearances to the allied powers.

In conclusion I would refer you to the records of the British authorities, which show conclusively that a similar agitation against Norway was raised in the British press, and the foreign office issued a statement that were they to discontinue shipments to Norway not Germany would starve, but Norway.

I trust that you will give this matter your courteous consideration, and if I can be of any assistance to you in giving you any data that may be advantageous to you, kindly command me.

Respectfully, yours,

J. J. MCGOWAN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. If there is nothing more to come before the Senate to-day, in the absence of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The House met at 1 p. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father of truth, purity, justice, mercy, love, let Thy spirit possess us that we may think clearly, act wisely, and do justly whenever we are called to act in the affairs of life, whether as individuals or servants of the public weal, that we may possess an approving conscience, a tranquil mind, a pure heart, and look forward with boundless faith in the overruling of Thy Providence for the good of mankind, after the similitude of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, April 14, 1917, was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein the patriotic appeal of the President of the United States to the American people which appears in the morning papers, and which contains some very timely and valuable advice as to how those who are not to enlist can render invaluable aid to the country in other lines of endeavor in this hour when it needs their help.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the address of the President to the American people as appearing in the morning papers. Is there objection?

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, would it not be better to have that published as a public document and sent out in that way?

Mr. LANGLEY. I thought of that, Mr. Speaker, but I take it that all of the newspapers of the country will reproduce the address, and my purpose was merely to aid in the publicity of this well-timed and most interesting statement from the head of the Nation, which I think every American citizen ought to read, by printing it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to suggest that there ought to be half a million copies of it printed, so that we can circulate them over the country.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, of course that matter can come up a little later, after unanimous consent is given to the gentleman from Kentucky to extend his remarks. The question of printing the President's address as it appears in the morning papers will come up as a separate proposition.

Mr. LANGLEY. I think so, too.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a resolution of the Lincoln Republican Club, of the city of Yonkers, N. Y., in loyal support of the President.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a resolution adopted by the supreme board of directors of the Knights of Columbus.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the same subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a patriotic song written by Eleanore See Inslee, of my district.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I did not understand the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a patriotic song. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein communications from and resolutions adopted by certain organizations in my district.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein resolutions adopted at a patriotic mass meeting in the city of Memphis, Tenn., presided over by Hon. T. C. Ashcroft, mayor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the question of food products by printing therein a report made by the University of Illinois, and also upon the same subject an advertisement calling for farm hands in western Canada.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand the gentleman desires to print an advertisement for farm hands in western Canada?

Mr. MASON. I wish to do that, but I shall strike out the name of the advertiser so that it will not be an advertisement.

Mr. BARNHART. I have no objection to the first part of it, but I shall object to it unless the advertising feature is omitted.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, there is a reason for it.

Mr. BARNHART. I will hear the reason.

Mr. MASON. It is simply to call the attention of the censors to the matter. It is an advertisement offering high wages, a comfortable home, without any expense, to American farm boys; and it contains a statement there shall be no compulsory military service. I think that ought to be censored. I do not think any country ought to be allowed to put that sort of an advertisement in, and for that reason I strike out the name of the advertiser so it does not become an advertisement.

Mr. BARNHART. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois what is the purpose of inserting an advertisement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. MASON. There are two purposes. One is to show the censors of the newspapers of this country that there is an unfriendly advertisement running in an endeavor to take away the food producers of the country and invites them to Canada, where there will be no compulsory military service. The other object is to show the people who are asking for compulsory military service that we may help some of our allies that do not have compulsory service in their own country and in their own colonies, so there is a double purpose.

Mr. BARNHART. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object for a moment, I do not know whether it is the same advertisement, but my attention has been called to an advertisement, I think of the Canadian Government, advertising for 50,000 Americans to come to Canada and cultivate the soil there.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the same subject of crop production.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the same subject as the gentleman from Illinois. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject of military service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman desires to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of military service. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill (H. R. 2893) to amend section 10 of chapter 2 of the Criminal Code, which bill was up Saturday afternoon and partially discussed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not know that I shall, I see the gentleman from North Carolina is not here. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] told me the other day that the bill was reported, but I have not gotten a reported copy and it has not been printed as being reported and it is not on the calendar. His attention ought to be directed to it.

Mr. GARNER. What is the title of the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is the bill (H. R. 2893) to amend section 10 of chapter 2 of the Criminal Code by adding a proviso—

That this section shall not apply to citizens or subjects of any country engaged in war with a country with which the United States is at war.

Mr. Speaker, rather than take up the time of the House I desire to place a statement in the RECORD at an early date containing some information regarding the bill. I ask that privilege.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] told me on Saturday this bill has been reported.

Mr. MANN. I see it is not on the calendar; I looked this morning, and it is not on the list of reported bills. I am careful to get all bills reported, and I have not received that.

The SPEAKER. One of the clerks informs the Chair that the report on this bill has just been put in the basket.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman told me the other day it was reported; I did not know.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
JOHN J. EAGAN,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. On page 56 of the bill, amendment numbered 30, as the bill was presented to the House it passed the House with the following language:

Lighthouse vessels, for salaries and wages of officers and crews of light vessels and lighthouse tenders, including temporary employment when necessary, $23,000.

Do I understand the House conferees agreed to have that language eliminated from the bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They did.

Mr. HAWLEY. For what reason?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The provision was for crews for new vessels that it was expected would be in commission before the beginning of the next fiscal year. The Senate committee was informed by the department that the vessels would not be available and could not be put in commission and that the money will not be required.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I notice in the report of the conferees that Senate amendments 37, 38, and so forth, were agreed to by the conferees on the part of the House, except one amendment proposing to pay not to exceed $250 from the appropriation of $35,000 as part of the inaugural expenses. I wanted to state to the gentleman that the service rendered was by the Deputy Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, and consisted of a great deal of labor and work in preparing and distributing the tickets to the inaugural platform.

To my personal knowledge this man worked both day and night, many times at night, with the force of clerks in order to prepare those tickets and invitations for distribution. The question came up at one of the meetings of the inaugural committee, and all of the members of the committee—the three Members representing the Senate as well as the three Members representing the House—thought he ought to have $250 as a reasonable compensation for the services rendered by him. I see that has been stricken out, and I would like to ask the gentleman why?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the managers upon the part of the House did not agree to the amendment because of the somewhat peculiar situation. For a number of years there has been a controversy between the two Houses because of the fact that the Senate has from time to time proposed to pay to certain of its employees money in addition to the compensation fixed by law. After six or seven years the House has now come to an understanding with the Senate that that practice shall be abandoned. It has not been followed in the last year or two. Section 1765 of the Revised Statutes provides:

No officer in any branch of the public service, or any other person whose salary, pay, or emoluments are fixed by law or regulations, shall receive any additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation, in any form whatever, for the disbursement of public money, or for any other service or duty whatever, unless the same is authorized by law, and the appropriation therefor explicitly states that it is for such additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation.

It seemed to the managers on the part of the House that it would be unjustifiable to waive that provision of the Revised Statutes on behalf of this man. He may have done some extra work. So far as a somewhat hasty investigation disclosed, no similar provision has been made at other inaugural times. The managers on the part of the House did not believe it was wise to establish the precedent of paying this additional compensation in the face of the express prohibition of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. RUCKER. If the gentleman will permit me, my judgment of the Revised Statute quoted by the gentleman is that it has reference to extra pay for performing the official duties of the employee. These were duties entirely outside of his official duties.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Revised Statutes state "for any other service or duty whatever." It could not be more comprehensive.

Mr. RUCKER. It must be considered in the light of the purpose for which it was enacted.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The House and its Representatives are continuallly condemning the executive departments for attempting to increase the compensation of employees in those departments in contravention of the statutes, and it was not thought desirable to set such a pernicious example by doing for an employee of the Senate what is not permitted in any other place.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield three minutes to me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. RUCKER. I want to say in connection with this matter—and I speak for myself and my associates on the inaugural committee—that we have no earthly interest in the item under consideration. But we found it necessary to employ somebody who was competent to render the services rendered by Mr. McGrain, and he happens to be a deputy sergeant at arms of the Senate. He is the best qualified man, in my judgment, that could have been selected, by reason of his long experience in connection with similar matters. My judgment and recollection, differing from the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], is that heretofore this service has been paid for. At a meeting of the inaugural committee, at which Members of the Senate and of the House were present, this matter was brought up, and by unanimous action we agreed to recommend that the gentleman referred to be paid $250 for the services rendered by him. Much of that service was rendered after office hours and during the night. I myself went to his room and sent to his room several times after night in connection with the arrangements for the last presidential inauguration. We thought there would be no question about the payment for this service in view of the fact that the $250 was only a part of and taken out of the appropriation made for inaugural expenses. Personally and in behalf of the committee on the part of the House I wish to say that we feel very much embarrassed at the action of the conference committee. While I am not complaining of their action, it embarrasses us, because in good faith, speaking as I feel authorized to speak for the House of Representatives, we agreed that this sum should be paid, and we never had a thought that it would not be paid. If there is any way by which it can be paid it certainly should be paid. And if necessary, in order to do simple justice—and I have a little more concern and feel a deeper interest than if he was a House employee, the gentleman being a Senate employee—in order to keep faith and to do what we in effect pledged we would do and what we thought we had authority to pledge the House to do, I would like to see this conference report voted down and sent back to conference in order that we might place ourselves in a correct attitude with reference to this item of $250, which does not increase the appropriation a particle, but is to be paid out of the sum appropriated for inaugural expenses.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I take it that there has been no question but that if the Joint Inaugural Committee had employed a special clerk or person to do this work there would have been no complaint concerning it. I would like to verify, of my own knowledge, what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] has said, and that is that this gentleman rendered service which had to be rendered, and which was entirely outside the line of his ordinary official duties Of course, I appreciate the force of the statute which the gentleman from New York has read, but it seems to me that this is a very just item. If it had not been for the services which were rendered by this gentleman, we would never have been able to have handled the tickets with the satisfaction that apparently they were handled to the Members of the House.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I conclude by making the additional observation—and I believe the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] will also concur in this statement—that there is no one about this Capitol or about the city of Washington who could have rendered so efficient service as the gentleman who rendered the service, and he ought to be paid for it. I do not know whether it is proper or not, but, so far as I am concerned, I hope the House will vote down the conference report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In view of the fact that the bill carries $62,000,000 for services of the Army, for which it is in need, including pay of the National Guard who have been deprived of their money, and carries $100,000,000 as an emergency fund for the national defense, if the gentleman wishes to ask the House to vote this conference report down in order that a Senate employee may be paid $250 in the face of an express prohibition of the statute, I do not believe the House will gratify him.

Mr. RUCKER. Well, Mr. Speaker, as a lawyer I do not agree with the gentleman's construction of that statute—at least on this occasion. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I would not expect the gentleman to agree to it. If he agreed to it, I am sure he would not have urged the payment of that amount in violation of the law.

Mr. RUCKER. Our committee agreed to it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not a personal matter. As a matter of fact, if the statement had been made that the Members of the Senate and House had agreed to it, I do not know that it would have affected my position. No doubt this man rendered satisfactory service, but the service was rendered by him in the time he was employed. The Deputy Sergeant at Arms of the Senate during the last few weeks of the session has not any evenings off, and any work performed at night was undoubtedly performed by him when he was subject to the call of the Senate. A Member of Congress has no time off. He is not off when Congress is not in session. He is still on the pay roll, and his time still belongs to the Government.

Mr. RUCKER. If the gentleman will pardon me, it is hardly fair, in view of the statement I have made and the statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], for the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to say that, because it is true that this man did work at night. I state this as a fact within my personal knowledge.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No doubt this man rendered valuable service, but he did not do it in time that did not belong to the Government.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Missouri a question in that connection?

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman can, if I have the time.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. MANN. Well, I hope the gentleman may have time granted him to answer this question: Why did not the inaugural committee get the service of one of the sergeants at arms of the House?

Mr. RUCKER. Well, I will be glad to answer the gentleman, but it may involve a recitation that I may not have time to make. As a matter of fact, elsewhere there is a sentiment existing that the House has nothing to do with presidential inaugurations.

Mr. MANN. I know that, and that is the reason why I asked the question. Having "hogged" the place, now they want to pay for it. That is the fact.

Mr. RUCKER. No; if the gentleman will permit me to finish my answer which I had not concluded. I want to give him full information. This suggestion does not come from employees. It comes from other gentlemen who are not recognized as employees of the Senate, and by reason of that sentiment, which I confess has too long existed, and existed to too great an extent, it happens that in connection with the Senate we find men better qualified to perform this service than any of those who serve in connection with the House. Let me say to the gentleman that your committee on inauguration amply took care of the officers of the House. At least we tried to do it.

Mr. MANN. Yes. I think they did. I think they took care of the House in very good shape. But we all know that when it comes to these plans of inauguration the Senate insists on being practically the whole thing. It insists upon having its employees handle the work of the inaugural committee, because it thinks it has the right to control. That being the case, they having one of their employees working at a time when he ought to be willing to work all his spare time in the closing days of the session, I doubt whether there is any reason to pay him extra.

Mr. RUCKER. The service ought to be paid for.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, we are always confronted with this actual situation that exists; that is, that technically there is no organized House on the day of inauguration. There are certain of the inaugural ceremonies which under custom always occur in the Senate Chamber—the inauguration of the Vice President, for instance. A goodly portion of the work of the inaugural committee consists of the preparation and issuance of tickets to the Senate Chamber. I am inclined to think the Senate is quite "hoggish," but I do not think that in this matter it is entirely accurate to say that the Senate has "hogged" the whole thing——

Mr. MANN. Well, then, I will withdraw that statement. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee (continuing). When really the House had no official status at that time.

Mr. MANN. Well, the House had a committee and had officers and had employees, and they all had official status. The committee had an official status. While the House itself had then no official status, it did up to that time have an official status, and the committee had also. However, I am not complaining at all. I think the committee this time on the part of the House took care of the House in an admirable manner and did everything that could be asked. [Applause.] It did better than any committee has ever done before.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We did the best we could.

Mr. RUCKER. We made this agreement while we did have an official standing.

Mr. MANN. I understand. The gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Tennessee always have an official status with me.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question with reference to amendment numbered 22. The Senate put in a provision that the new central heating and power plant furnish heat, light, and power for the new Interior Department Building. To tell the truth, I had supposed that that had already been provided by law until the Senate put this provision in. Now, that has gone out. The gentleman from New York and myself are members of the House Office Building Commission, and we recently authorized, at the request of the Treasury Department, connection with the Capitol heating and power plant temporarily to furnish heat, light, and power to the new Interior Building until the central heating plant could be completed and it would be able to furnish those things to the new Interior Building. Having stricken this out, is it the idea of the gentleman from New York that the Capitol heating and power plant is to furnish permanent heat and light to the new Interior Department Building?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This building is enumerated among the buildings to be furnished with heat, light, and power from the new plant. This particular provision requires the Secretary to furnish heat, light, and power. The managers on the part of the House did not know what the effect of this provision would be, unless it was intended to compel the Treasury Department to furnish that heat, light, and power from the new building and to eliminate the chance of any possible appropriation for the Interior Department being charged with the cost of it. As it was enumerated with the other buildings and was in the same position as the other buildings to be furnished, the committee did not wish to have this mandatory provision left in.

Mr. MANN. I supposed it was about completed until I saw this item, and then I thought I might be mistaken.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We looked up the item carefully, and there is no mistake about it.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for an inquiry?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. There has been quite a good deal said about an item of $250 which very properly has gone out of the bill; but so far I have heard nothing said about the little item of $100,000,000 for national security and defense. Does the chairman intend to make a statement to the House of the purposes for which it is expected that money will be expended?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not so comprehensive a statement as the inquiry of the gentleman would indicate. The Senate——

Mr. MONDELL. We all realize the very proper attitude of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and we have listened with great interest and approval to his statement that he believes that while Congress should be liberal in making appropriations, it should do its duty in keeping track of expenditures. Therefore I am confident that he has some general information with regard to the use of this money.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the bill as it passed the House carried $62,617,964.81.

The Senate added $102,260,354.82. The Senate receded from $1,033,362.15.

The House receded from $101,226,992.67. Of this sum $100,000,000 is contained in Senate amendment No. 50, which reads as follows:

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

For the national security and defense, and for each and every purpose connected therewith, to be expended at the discretion of the President, and to be immediately available and to remain available until December 31, 1917, $100,000,000.

This item was inserted in the bill by the Senate. There was no formal hearing by the Committee on Appropriations about the item. Statements were made to me personally by a member of the Cabinet, speaking for the President. It was stated that as the country had just engaged in war there were innumerable things apt to arise which could not be anticipated and which would require some expenditure of public funds; that it was impossible to say what the exigencies might be or what the requirements would be; that it was believed that in the first six or seven months of this period, even though Congress might be in session, there might be innumerable matters that it would be desirable from a military standpoint to have done without the publicity accompanying a request for the money and an explanation of the purposes for which the expenditure was to be made.

In view of the fact that there were pending in Congress at the time estimates aggregating $3,400,000,000 for military purposes, and that the estimates had been submitted in such shape that it would be impossible either to know what was proposed to be done or what would be done with the money, except in the most general way, and that accompanying the estimates the request had been made, to the extent of $500,000,000 at least, to suspend all limitations of every character upon the expenditure of public money, and that in the estimate for $2,900,000,000 the request was made that the money should be expended under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the President, which, in effect, would be to suspend all those safeguards that the years of our experience have demonstrated to be necessary, the managers upon the part of the House believed it to be highly desirable to place $100,000,000 at the disposal of the President for emergency purposes. Thereafter in recommending the appropriations for the military expenditures of the Government it would be possible to have them in sufficient detail and to have applied to them the present limitations of law, so that the Congress would be assured not only that it was giving ample funds for the prosecution of the war but that it was performing its duty in a manner that would be most beneficial to the country.

Mr. Speaker, at a time like this, as I have said several times within the very recent past, the most patriotic duty this House can perform is not to put unlimited means and power without restriction in the hands of the Executive, but to so safeguard public expenditures as to relieve the executive departments of the burdens and responsibilities that would result from such unlimited power. In a time like this, when enormous expenditures are to be made, unless the utmost care is exercised both by the legislative and the executive, waste, extravagance, and indefensible expenditures will inevitably result. We can do much to eliminate and prevent waste and extravagance and improper expenditure by safeguarding, as far as possible, the expenditure of public funds; so it is believed that if $100,000,000 be placed at the disposal of the President for the time between now and December 31 of the present year, to be disbursed by him, in his discretion, for the national defense, it will enable and will justify the making of the other appropriations that are required in such enormous sums, with such particularity as has been customary in making appropriations for the support of the Government.

I can repeat what I said on Saturday, based on further information that has come into my possession, that there is a greater necessity for making these appropriations in detail than I had suspected when the estimates were first submitted, and a statement could be made to the House that would require the House, in the interest of the public welfare, not to make such large grants in lump sums without restriction. I say this much without in any way reflecting upon the integrity, the capacity, or the disposition of any official to do other than what is for the best interests of the country.

The managers upon the part of the House have made a technical violation of the rule in that they transferred from under the Interior Department an item applicable to the Senate over to the legislative department; but as it was only a transposition it was not believed that objection would be made, although I believe the House should be informed of the fact.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. There is on the calendar now a Senate bill which authorizes the United States to prosecute practically all crimes which might be committed within the confines of our exterior boundaries, regardless of State control. There is another bill on the calendar which authorizes the President to take all vessels, shipping, barges, or anything else that navigates the sea, that we de not already own. I suppose this $100,000,000 will come in very handy for these purposes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The statement that was made was that it was to be used for purposes that would be different. At least that is the impression I got. I understand a request is to be made for a very large appropriation for the purposes indicated by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Those bills are on the calendar. They do not either of them carry any appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They should not. They should first get the authority and then ask for the money.

Mr. MANN. Perhaps they should not, but usually they do where there is any reason for it. The Committee on Naval Affairs have reported one bill, and that committee have the authority to report appropriations. I do not know whether they will use this $100,000,000 and thousands of millions of dollars more for such purposes. However, I would like to ask the gentleman another question. In view of the fact that the claim has sometimes been made that the House ought to be a mere rubber stamp and ought not even to change phraseology—in this case the phraseology has not been changed—I suppose this $100,000,000 appropriation was probably prepared in the Treasury Department in the form in which it appears.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know where it was prepared.

Mr. MANN. It was prepared in the Treasury Department or in the Senate, but how long since it became necessary in a deficiency bill to make an appropriation and say the amount shall be immediately available?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not necessary.

Mr. MANN. I know that it is not necessary, and the Treasury Department ought to know it, although doubtless the man who drew it did not know it. I call attention to it to show the carelessness with which a lot of these items come to the body that really watches them. Think of sending down a deficiency item from the Treasury Department to go into a deficiency bill with a statement that it is to be immediately available. That is what a deficiency bill is for.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FERRIS. The chairman of the committee a moment ago said that there had been one instance where there was a violation of the rule. I want to ask the gentleman if that has any reference to the transfer of the new building for the Interior Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it was an amendment for the maintenance of miscellaneous supplies for the Senate Office Building. It belongs under the head of "legislative" and in that portion of the bill, and the Senate inserted it under the portion in connection with the Interior Department. For the sake of convenience and reference it ought to be in that part of the bill where such items should be found.

Mr. FERRIS. I have no objection at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has nothing to do with the item in the bill with reference to the transfer of the new Interior Department Building for the use of any other department. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 15 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended 15 minutes for the purpose of yielding half an hour to the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that his time be extended 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next at noon. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 29 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there was an understanding on Saturday that the deficiency bill would be agreed to as soon as possible and that then we would adjourn.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman from Missouri wants to speak for half an hour, and following that I will move the previous question and then move to adjourn. However, the Committee on Accounts has one resolution which it wants to bring in.

Mr. MANN. I have some work to do, but I will stay here until we adjourn. It may put off the appointment of committees another day; I do not know.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will make this statement to the gentleman, that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri I will move the previous question, and after that I will move to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that Judge PARK, chairman of the Committee on Accounts, has a resolution that he wants acted upon.

Mr. MANN. And I want to be here when it comes up.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why can not the gentleman from Missouri postpone his remarks?

Mr. BORLAND. I could have taken time in my own right, but I did not.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think the gentleman could on this proposition.

Mr. BORLAND. I think so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In order to keep the agreement with the gentleman from Illinois I will move that the House adjourn after this conference report shall have been agreed to before anything comes up.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, this bill as it comes to this body contains an appropriation of $100,000,000, to be expended at the discretion of the President of the United States for national defense. We all recognize that that is simply the beginning of a very large expenditure upon a very large plan for national defense, and it is to that particular item of the bill and to that particular policy that I desire to address myself during the time that is allotted to me.

Mr. Speaker, we have every reason to expect that this Nation is on the eve of a very serious struggle which will put to the test all of its resources and demand its best efforts. Even if it should happily prove that the contest is not as long or as bitter as we have anticipated, still it is the part of wisdom for us to marshal our resources in the most prompt and efficient way. It is the part of wisdom to avoid the ghastly mistakes of the past which have been so costly in human lives as well as in national treasure. It is well for us to benefit by the lesson of the other nations who have been drawn into this great modern war, especially our British cousins, who were so unprepared for a contest on land and who have had to create, drill, and equip an army while holding the enemy at bay.

The very suggestion of universal liability to military service as applied to our own country seems to have caused a shock to the minds of many gentlemen in this House. To my mind it is the fairest, safest, and most democratic method of national defense. [Applause.] It is infinitely superior to a mercenary force or to a system of voluntary enlistment. It contains an element of justice and equality which should appeal to all Americans. Say what we will, in the last analysis it is the sole resource for national defense. It will not be amiss, therefore, even this early in the contest, to consider it seriously and to contrast it with other possible methods of creating a military force.

There are three methods of providing an armed force: The first is a purely mercenary army of professional soldiers—enlisted, paid, and drilled in time of peace for immediate use when the danger of war arises; the second is the creation of an army of volunteers to meet and repel a hostile attack; the third is universal training, universal liability to military service and the selective draft of the necessary number of trained men at the time and to the extent that the need for their service appears. You are asked to consider seriously the latter, and to eliminate all prejudice of opinion in contrasting its advantages with the other two.

No one in a republic like this, I venture to say, would undertake to advocate or to defend the creation of a mercenary force of soldiers large enough to furnish any adequate protection to the Nation in case of need. The evils of such a system are obvious. It is impossible to get sufficient men to enlist in the Army in time of peace in competition with the rewards and opportunities of civil life. It would be a sad day for this country if service in the Army offered better attractions than employment in the great productive industries in the land. I hope the day will never come when the career of professional soldier will attract such a number of men in this country away from the pursuits of industry and peace. Yet in the past we have depended wholly for our emergency protection upon a mercenary force, which really means that we have had no protection at all. Our professional Army has been large enough to constitute an extremely expensive toy, but utterly inadequate for any other purpose. For a generation following the Civil War our little Army was useful in protecting the western frontier against the turbulent Indians, but since the Indian troubles have ceased our Army has been of no value whatever although it has cost us an enormous amount of money. It has provided, to a certain extent, a number of officers, educated and trained at the national expense, but the men who pass through its ranks by enlistment have not formed a national reserve available in time of war.

Prior to the recent national defense act our standing army numbered barely 80,000 men for a Nation of 100,000,000 people, and yet this Army cost us $125,000,000 annually. Our sister Republic of Switzerland provided itself with a trained force of 425,000 men at a national cost of $9,000,000. These figures are humiliating as well as shocking. Our Army costs thirteen times as much as the Army of Switzerland, and yet is only one-fifth the size. But even if we were able to provide a mercenary army of sufficient size to be of real value, and even if we were willing to pay the disgraceful cost of such a system, I still feel that the mercenary army is the most undemocratic and dangerous form of militarism. No patriotic American, no true Democrat, should wish to see in this country a mercenary army large enough to be a real source of protection to the Nation under modern conditions of warfare. Such an army would be a constant menace to our own institutions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. No; I can not yield now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington makes the point that no quorum is present, and the Chair will count.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will withdraw the point of no quorum at present, but I would like to have the gentleman yield to me for a question.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like to, but I am limited in my time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman promised me that he would yield.

Mr. BORLAND. No; I asked the gentleman to ask for time in concert with me, but the gentleman declined to do it.

But it is a favorite theory that we do not need either a standing army or any other form of military preparation, because patriotic volunteers will spring to the defense of the flag by unnumbered thousands at the first clarion call of danger. Much weight is given to this opinion by the fact that our American people are extremely patriotic and volunteer very readily upon every summons of the Nation. Yet the system is inherently weak and dangerous. The danger will become more and more acute under the highly organized and scientific conditions of modern warfare. An army of volunteers who have had little or no previous military training is perfectly useless for immediate service. It is criminal carelessness approaching deliberate murder to send such men into the field to meet a trained and disciplined army of the foe, and a statesman who would advocate such a thing would be guilty of ignorance so gross as to amount to self-confessed incompefence.

It takes from 6 to 18 months to physically train such a force, and it takes at least that long to equip it with arms, munitions, camp supplies, hospital facilities, and other essentials for efficient action. The recent example of England ought to be enough to teach us its bloody lesson. Who doubts that if it had not been for the English fleet the fair fields of old England would to-day be in the condition of northern France and Belgium, and the historical English cathedrals would present the same ghastly ruins that marked the course across the Channel? Behind the protection of her fleet England has created in a little more than two years a trained and equipped army of 5,000,000 men. She gave voluntary enlistment a thorough and adequate trial. Those gentlemen who say we could succeed any better with volunteer enlistment will have to admit that they are reckoning with a partially defeated foe and are sheltering themselves behind the English fleet. If we had the grave peril of being confronted with a fresh and unhampered enemy with the conditions under which this war began in 1914 those gentlemen would have to admit that their policy of volunteer enlistment, with the training and equipment to follow after enlistment and while the enemy was vigorously attacking, would be a policy of criminal folly. They would find themselves wasting thousands of innocent lives and blasting the homes, fortunes, and families of our people.

Assuming that we could enlist 5,000,000 men, I contend that it would be unjust as well as unwise. Let no man attempt to twist this into a reflection upon the patriotic impulses of the American people.

I represent a district which has always furnished more than its just proportion of volunteers and I believe always will. In the recent troubles in Mexico we sent from that district one full regiment of Infantry, two batteries of Field Artillery, one company of Signal Corps, one company of Hospital Corps, and contributed more than 500 recruits to the Regular Army and to other military organizations throughout the State. I should like to see this record contrasted with the record of every congressional district in the United States. The very promptness and enthusiasm of this response in the way of volunteer enlistment and the contrast it might offer to the results in other sections of the country only adds emphasis to the contention that it is not equality, not justice, and not sound national policy.

But there are other evils of the volunteer-enlistment system besides the criminal folly of sending men into the field without any equipment but enthusiasm and patriotic valor. It is the very essence of the volunteer system that it takes the best—the cream of the community, the enterprising young men who are of value in every walk of life. They are the first to volunteer, the first to go, and the slacker stays at home to be protected. The volunteer system often—and, in fact, commonly—takes young men out of the most necessary pursuits in the community, cripples its industries, and demoralizes its efficiency, while those who could be more readily spared do not volunteer. I believe that if a country is worth having it is worth protecting, and if it is worth protecting it is as much the duty of one man to protect it as another. The volunteer system has never succeeded in raising an army of any magnitude, and the number of men who can be enlisted under this system with reasonable promptness is very much smaller than we are led to believe. The first burst of enthusiasm sounds so general and widespread that men are deceived into overestimating its actual results. Very soon after the first cream is skimmed off the young population of the country, resort is had to the offer of bounties, and then we have the professional bounty jumper, the deserter, and all the other disgraces that are so carefully covered up in the flamboyant exuberance of the oratory of the professional demagogue. We see the strange spectacle of men being appealed to by fiery and unbridled harangues, their passions inflamed, and their sentiments worked upon by professional orators. We see them tempted by bounties and other real or imaginary rewards, and even cajoled by feminine beauty into enlisting into the ranks of the Army. These are some of the things clinging closely about the volunteer system that few public men care to lay open to the gaze of their fellow citizens, but the time has now come to look national danger squarely in the eye and to tell the truth at least to ourselves. Why were there such frightful losses by disease and exposure during the Civil War, and why did we come finally to conscription as an ultimate resource? Let us look unflinchingly at the bare truth.

The statistics of the War Department show that the total enlistments during the Civil War were 5,175,320 men. Of these the number between 22 and 45 years of age was 681,044; between 18 and 22, 2,139,798; and between 10 and 18, 2,334,478. Examine these figures with care. Less than 25 per cent of the men in the Civil War were 22 years or older, and a very large percentage of these were bounty men and substitutes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. No; I can not yield; I have not the time. The real volunteers are represented by the four and a half million men under 22 years of age, and the darkest part of the picture is the fact that 51 per cent of the men were between 10 and 18 years of age. It is possible to beat the tom-tom through the streets of the village to enlist the schoolboys. Are we ready to do that a second time, and can this great Nation dream of relying upon such a method of national defense?

This is a plain, unvarnished record of the greatest example of volunteer enlistment which the world has ever seen. If such results occurred with all the wonderful fire of enthusiasm of the Civil War, can we expect anything better or different in the contest with a foreign enemy? Are not gentlemen soberly advocating a system which will enlist the schoolboy and the thoughtless enthusiast and make of him more than 50 per cent of the fighting force of the Nation? Nay, worse; send him into the trenches by the thousands to die by reason of inexperience and lack of physical training?

For my own part I am strongly impressed with the democratic method of universal military service and selective draft. Every man in the Nation of military age and physical capacity should be ready and willing to defend his country. He owes this duty to the Nation which protects him, and the Nation owes him the duty to provide the necessary machinery of organization and proper arms and equipment for service. It owes nim more than this. It owes him the plain justice that he shall not be called upon unless his services are needed, and that every other man in the country shall be liable to the same call under the same circumstances.

It owes him protection from the gross injustice and discrimination of the volunteer system. It owes also to the people at large the duty of selecting for service in the field those men who can be best spared from the industrial and agricultural pursuits at home so that the full resources of the Nation may be marshaled for the common defense. A selective draft will raise the required number of soldiers with the least disturbance of those industrial pursuits which feed the Army and equip it for the field.

A volunteer force deranges every activity of the Nation. The argument for utility and efficiency is strongly in favor of a selective draft as against the volunteer system, but the argument of abstract justice, equality, and democracy is still stronger. To fight a war on voluntary offers of military service is like running the Government on private charity. I would as soon advocate that the Government, when it needed money for its national existence, should pass around the hat among the taxpayers and ask voluntary contributions. If taxes for the support of the Government in time of peace and for its protection in time of war are universal, uniform, and compulsory there is no sound reason why military service should not also be.

What would we think of a nation which relied upon voluntary contributions to carry on its governmental work? What would we think of the sense of justice of a nation which would permit part of its citizens to contribute toward the national support and relieve all those who were unwilling to do so? What would we think of a system which would take the money of the generous and patriotic and spare the hoards of the miser and the extortionist? Yet that is precisely the system which gentlemen are advocating when it comes to personal military service in the defense of the Nation.

Has the system of universal military training ever been tried by a republic and has it proven disastrous to republican institutions? Has it inculcated a spirit of militarism or a desire for conquest or aggression? Has it destroyed the dignity of the citizens or undermined the safety of the State?

All of these questions are answered by the experience of our sister Republic of Switzerland, which has had such a system in operation since 1848. There is no more democratic nation in the world than Switzerland nor one more progressive in its legislation for the rights of the individual man. In fact, there is no nation in the world to-day which has a wider sphere of local self-government, not excepting our own glorious Republic. There is no nation in which there is less centralization of power or less opportunity for the abuse of federal or national authority.

Switzerland has no standing army, but every Swiss citizen from his twentieth to his forty-eighth year is liable for military service, except those who are excused for physical defects, and they must pay a special exemption tax. There are no professional soldiers in Switzerland except a limited number of the higher officers of the army, but every Swiss soldier is engaged in some useful pursuit in civil life. Their system really begins with the training of boys in physical exercise in the public schools, so that when the lads reach manhood they are sound in body and mind and capable, with a small amount of technical instruction, of developing into good soldiers. For the size of their nation the Swiss have been for hundreds of years the greatest soldiers the world has ever produced. This very fact, that every man is trained to arms and is able to defend his own rights and the rights of his country, is the strongest pillar of their democracy. No military despotism can flourish in a nation where every man is a part of the trained fighting force. It is only where some of the population can be used to overawe or oppress other portions of the population that a military despotism is possible.

The complete answer to the charge that militarism will arise from universal military training is found in the experience of the Swiss. Every Swiss citizen in his twentieth year is required to take 10 weeks of active military training in the field. Each year thereafter up to his thirty-second year he must spend 2 weeks of military training in the field. From his thirty-second to his fortieth year he spends but four periods of 1 week each in active service, and from his fortieth to his forty-eighth year he spends but two periods of 1 week each. By this system, therefore, their first line of defense is men between 20 and 32, their second line of defense men between 32 and 40, and third line of defense men between 40 and 48. The second and third lines of defense are only kept in sufficient training to know their places in the various companies, regiments, and divisions and to keep up with the necessary inspection and drilling. This system, light as it is upon the individual man, has proven, by reason of its universality and uniformity, sufficient to put the entire nation upon a basis of adequate defense. It has stood the test of the last three years under circumstances of the most extraordinary peril. No hostile foot has touched the soil of Switzerland. Yet Switzerland lies in the very path of the contending armies, and all the treaties in the world would have been mere scraps of paper to protect her from invasion if it had suited the military necessity of any nation to cross her territory.

It is apparent that it would have been very advantageous to have used Switzerland as a highway in the present war. Why was she not made such a highway, and why did not the armies rush across her soil as they did across that of Belgium and Luxemburg? There is but one answer, and that is the cost would have been greater than the result was worth. Any one of the big nations could have overwhelmed Switzerland, but it would have cost more in blood and treasure that it was worth to do so, and predatory forces were glad to find an easier road to their goal.

At the first declaration of war in Europe, in August, 1914, Switzerland mobilized her entire military force on four frontiers—Germany, France, Austria, and Italy. Four hundred and twenty-five thousand bayonets gleamed along the borders of Switzerland as a legible notice to the world not to invade its national integrity. Behind those rifles were the finest marksmen in the world. The most ruthless commander, the most unprincipled violator of national rights, the blindest devotee of military necessity, the most bloodthirsty feudal despot hesitated to assail the little Republic protected by a hedge of bayonets.

Suppose Switzerland, instead of having universal military service and a trained force in 1914, instead of having the men to call to arms and the rifles to put in their hands, had relied upon the theory of a volunteer service growing out of spontaneous patriotic enthusiasm. Suppose her statesmen had arisen in the Federal Assembly and said, "A million men will spring to arms overnight with the first sound of danger to our beloved land." Suppose the recruiting officers had gotten out on the street corners and said, "Come on, boys, and enlist. If you enlist, we will try to find uniforms and guns for you." Suppose they had said, "We will try and teach you a little military tactics and inure you to the hardships of camp life before the enemy concludes to cross the Swiss border."

If any or all of these absurd things had occurred, which are now being seriously advocated by responsible public men in America, the result to Switzerland would have been no joke. It would not have been the roaring farce that these questions imply. It would have been the appalling tragedy of the ages. The little Republic that for 600 years has maintained its freedom from tyranny, has held aloft the light of religion, science, literature, and art, and has made itself the greatest force in the history of Europe and the world, would have been wiped out in a single night and its civilization engulfed in a sea of blood. Only the hedge of bayonets saved Switzerland.

As I believe, a great war is upon us. At least, we have challenged the right of any nation, great or small, to destroy our commerce, murder our citizens, and invade our national rights. We propose to make American citizenship mean something. We intend to do so by a patent of nobility respected at home and abroad. We intend that the flag shall protect the American on land or sea; that all of the highways of the world and all the pursuits of civilization shall be open to our citizens without let or hindrance, without asking the leave or permission of any other nation. We intend that America shall stand squarely upon its own feet as an independent Nation and not as a commercial or political vassal of any power.

This is the common purpose of all Americans and the common instinct of every patriotic soul. To issue this challenge, to throw down the gage, to enter this contest under conditions of modern warfare, is the most serious and appalling business which has ever confronted our Nation. Our national isolation is gone. We are grown too big to keep out of the way of other nations. Our paths must cross theirs and our rights must sometimes clash with their pretensions. We can defend those rights and defend them with vigor and success. A nation of 100,000,000 people, the richest nation to-day on the globe, inhabiting a country of boundless natural resources and inexhaustible wealth, with a population highly intelligent and skilled in every useful art, we have nothing to fear in a contest with any nation on earth. Our greatest danger, our greatest suffering, may come through our own negligence, our own criminal carelessness, our own failure to see clearly and estimate honestly the difficulties which we have challenged. If we marshal our resources of men and money, with the use of diligence, the sense of fairness, and the heart-searching honesty that real American patriotism demands in this hour, we have nothing to fear for the successful outcome of this struggle. Care at this time will save thousands of lives and protect thousands of homes from useless suffering and distress. Honesty and political courage will clothe our soldiers with the mighty armor of adequate and complete preparation, and make every life which is offered upon the altar of our country's need a potent force for victory instead of a useless sacrifice to political cowardice and incompetency.

If America arises in her true might, stretches her muscles and steels her nerves for the struggle, she will make of herself not only a foe respected, but a potent force in bringing again to the world universal peace, in driving from the political stage the last gnarled visage of feudal despotism, in showing again through the glowing pages of history that a democracy is not only able to live, that it is not only able to perpetuate itself, but that it is able to resist invasions upon its rights and to carry the banner of republican institutions across the tottering drawbridge of every feudal castle in the world. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

LV——47

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

Mr. ROSE, for to-day, on account of important business.

Mr. SCHALL, for a few days, on account of the death of his mother.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a letter to the President, accompanied by resolutions passed at a mass meeting of the citizens of northwestern Missouri.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein some arguments in favor of a bill which I introduced providing for universal military training at our schools and colleges.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the war declaration, a period of 10 days was granted within which all Members might extend their remarks. My colleague from Virginia, Mr. WATSON, has been preparing some extension of remarks, but has been sick and has been unable to complete them, and he asks unanimous consent to have three days longer in which to complete them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. WATSON] have 3 days additional to the 10 days allowed within which to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the war resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CLERK AND MESSENGER TO COMMITTEE ON DISPOSITION OF USELESS EXECUTIVE PAPERS.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 33 (H. Rept. No. 16).

Resolved, That the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers be allowed a clerk, at the rate of $6 per diem, and a messenger, at the rate of $60 per month, during the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. What does the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Executive Papers do, and what clerical work have they for clerks to perform?

Mr. PARK. I do not know. This was a resolution presented by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT], the father of the House, who has been here in service as long as any Member of the House, and it is something that has been done for three Congresses past.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will state to my colleague that we get a communication every few days from the various departments in reference to the destruction of various documents which they have in their files, and they all have to be examined. There is a joint committee of the Senate and the House upon it, and they need a clerk, and I presume ought to have a janitor.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL CAPITOL POLICE.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 30, authorizing the temporary employment of additional policemen for the Capitol Building and Grounds, and the Senate and House Office Buildings.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the address of the President to his fellow countrymen, appearing in the newspapers this morning, which has been already ordered printed in the RECORD, be printed as a public document, and that 300,000 copies be distributed through the folding room.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We can not do that unless we have some knowledge of the cost.

Mr. RUBEY. I have made an investigation as to the amount that this will cost, and it will not cost more than $500. That is the amount that we are entitled to use without the consent of the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART], the chairman of the Committee on Printing, been consulted?

Mr. RUBEY. I talked with him about the amount, and he does not object.

Mr. MANN. This is agreeable to him?

Mr. RUBEY. I think it is; yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. We ought to know whether it is or not.

Mr. MANN. I think that he is entitled to be consulted on a matter of this sort.

Mr. RUBEY. I spoke to him about it this morning. I did not ask him if he was in favor of it, but he said he wanted to find out how much it would cost; if it would come within the limit, all right; and I stated to him that it would come within the limit.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] said that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] or any other gentleman could ask unanimous consent, if he desired to do so; and these figures were secured and stated to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MANN. I do not understand what the gentleman from Georgia has just stated.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is agreeable to the gentleman from Indiana. Several of us talked to him about it when he was in the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. FISHER] states that the gentleman from Indiana requested him to introduce a resolution for this purpose.

Mr. FISHER. And it would be introduced at once.

Mr. MANN. Why not let the Committee on Printing act upon it?

Mr. RUBEY. The only objection is the delay. We would like to have this printed at once.

Mr. MANN. So far as delay is concerned, every newspaper in the country has published it. We meet again on Wednesday, and the Committee on Printing can report by that time.

Mr. RUBEY. If the gentleman insists upon it, I shall withdraw the request.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his request at this time.

Mr. RUBEY. I withdraw the request for the present, Mr. Speaker.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a letter received from a man who has a son in the Navy, with reference to the general situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we could not hear what the gentleman from Texas said.

Mr. SUMNERS. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by having printed therein a letter, written to me by a man who has a son in the Navy, with reference to his attitude—he is a countryman—toward the general military proposition before the country.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think I will not object at this time, but if I should ask to have printed in the RECORD all of the communications that I have received the size of the RECORD would have to be enlarged.

Mr. SUMNERS. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois this is the first request I have made during this whole matter, and I do not think I shall make another.

Mr. MANN. I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this a criticism of the Navy?

Mr. SUMNERS. No; it is a discussion of a matter from the standpoint of a man who has a son in the Navy and who has two or three other boys whom he expects to enlist and he believes the age limit ought to be above 25 years.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

TUESDAY, April 17, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, at every time in our past history when our national resources have been put to the test our fathers have sought Thy aid and Thou hast delivered them from all their troubles. We thank Thee to-day for the abundance of our possessions, for our bountiful wealth, for the rich fields which produce the harvest, for the spirit of patriotism which animates our universal life. We seek Thy aid that we may conserve those spiritual forces which can make us great and unconquerable. We pray that Thou wilt minister to each one of us this day by Thy spirit and truth, that we may be men of God, fighting under Thy direction, facing the responsibilities of our day that we may come speedily to a final and glorious victory. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, which will be inserted in the RECORD.

The concurrent resolution is as follows:

Concurrent resolution.

Be it resolved by the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii (the House of Representatives concurring), That we recognize that the pending acute national crisis creates a situation fraught with grave possibilities to the Nation and which challenges the patriotism of every American citizen.

Resolved, That we highly commend the position taken by the President of the United States in regard thereto as maintaining our highest standard of national honor and as promoting the humanitarian ideals of enlightened civilization.

Resolved, That should every honorable means be exhausted to maintain the neutrality of the United States inviolate, and should war prove inevitable, we pledge our loyal support and fullest aid to our country; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, President of the Senate, Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii.

SENATE CHAMBER, February 24.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island, which will be inserted in the RECORD.

The resolution is as follows:

[State of Rhode Island, etc., in general assembly, January session, A. D. 1917.]

Resolution indorsing daylight saving and urging Congress to pass necessary legislation.

Whereas the question of daylight saving, so called, has been forcibly brought to the attention of the world by the emergency of war; and

Whereas the adoption by Great Britain and other European countries of daylight saving in 1916 has resulted favorably, and the various countries that have accepted the plan will continue to do so in 1917; and

Whereas the trend of public opinion in the United States of America is distinctly in favor of the adoption of the daylight-saving plan in this country, inasmuch as the impending danger of war would make it advisable to adopt daylight saving as a necessary expedient at this time; and

Whereas it has been conclusively proven to be an efficient and economic practice, and will have a beneficial effect upon all persons in this State: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island hereby declares its firm conviction that the interests of the country will be benefited by the passage of this necessary legislation; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent by the secretary of state to the Vice President of the United States, that it may be by him transmitted to the Senate of the United States, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives for transmission to the House of Representatives.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
PROVIDENCE.

I hereby certify the foregoing to be a true copy of the original resolution approved by his excellency the governor on the 5th day of April, in the year 1917.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the State of Rhode Island this 9th day of April, in the year 1917.

[SEAL.] J. FRED PARKER, Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a telegram from Frank P. Bothwell, chairman, and Arthur E. Kelly, secretary, of a mass meeting of citizens of Ligonier, Ind., which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
Vice President, Washington, D. C.:

Resolved, That the citizens of Ligonier, Ind., and vicinity in mass meeting assembled heartily approve and indorse the action of the President and the Congress of the United States in relation to the declaration of a state of war existing between this country and Germany and pledge our support to such action as may be deemed necessary in the future.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be mailed to each the President, Vice President, and Speaker of the House of Representatives.

FRANK P. BOTHWELL, Chairman.
ARTHUR E. KELLY, Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Baptist Union of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LODGE. I present resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of North Attleboro, Mass., sustaining the President. I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOARD OF TRADE,
North Attleboro, Mass., April 10, 1917.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: The following resolution has been prepared under the direction of the North Attleboro Board of Trade:

Inasmuch as we are in the midst of the greatest series of events in the world's history, at a time when the very foundation principles of democratic government are most seriously menaced, when the rights of nations and of individuals have been most shamelessly abused, when the Government of the United States and her President are confronted with the gravest problems which have ever challenged her idealism, her courage, and her devotion to the broader interests of humanity and righteousness, the North Attleboro Board of Trade in full recognition of its own limitations expresses to His Excellency, the President of the United States, its full appreciation of these most unusual, unforeseen, and unprecedented situations which have arisen, and extends to our Government and its President our united sympathy and support in this great international struggle, together with our willingness to translate these our words and professions into such acts as shall be deemed most fitting by our Government and its President and Commander in Chief in the present emergencies. We further renew our obligations of fealty and service to our most glorious country and the cause for which it stands. That in the words of the Athenian oath we may transmit our country to the next generation "not less but greater, better, and more beautiful than it was transmitted to us."

ROBERT J. FULLER, President.
FRANK J. KELLY, Secretary.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have resolutions adopted at a large mass meeting at Seattle attended by several thousand people, and I understand that there were two or three overflow meetings. The resolutions indorse the action of the Government in declaring a state of belligerency to exist between this country and Germany and pledging support to the Government. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted at Arena mass meeting April 7, 1917.

Our country is at war with the Government of Germany;

After exhausting every honorable effort to maintain peace, the President and Congress have been forced by the continued aggressions of the Imperial German Government to accept the status of belligerency so unescapably imposed upon us;

Our citizens, while in pursuit of their orderly and legitimate errands upon the high seas, have been murdered by order of that Government in defiance not only of the laws of nations but of every dictate of justice and humanity;

By like orders, and following the same course of ruthless barbarism, our ships have been destroyed, our domestic laws defied, a reign of espionage and destructive terrorism inaugurated within our own boundaries and even an invasion and dismemberment of our territory invited and urged through an alliance sought to be formed against us by enticement of nations with whom we have no quarrel;

It is plain, as stated by the President, that the question whether the world shall be governed by reason and justice or by the sword, must be answered by the people of this generation, and there can be no true peace for our country or for others until the defeat of militarism and barbarism, personified in the existing Government of Germany, is possitively assured: Wherefore the citizens of Seattle, in mass meeting assembled,

Resolve, That we pledge anew our loyalty and devotion to the Government of the United States and to the principles on which it is founded; that, while expressing with vigor our abhorrence of war, we declare our readiness to afford unwavering and enthusiastic support to the lawful authorities of our country in all measures which they may ordain for bringing this conflict, most righteous on our part, to a victorious termination; and that we individually and collectively stand ready to make every sacrifice that may be required to insure the triumph of the great principles of justice, liberty, and right, and of permanent peace among the nations, which the President has declared to be the unselfish purpose of our people in this great struggle.

The trust of the enemy in dissension and discord among our citizens by which it is hoped to weaken our efforts on land and sea must be proven groundless.

To disappoint the enemy in these expectations, we pledge ourselves to unity of action and fidelity to leadership as the first effective blow we can strike in our own defense and in defense of human liberty.

Trusting fully in the loyalty and Americanism of those of our fellow citizens who, by reason of ties of blood or because of an aversion to war, have believed that our country could or should avoid the present conflict, we are confident, since the die is cast and the Nation's choice is made, that they will uphold in the amplest good faith the cause of our common country.

In the course of our history, from Lexington to the present day, our Army and Navy have stood every test in every trial, and have won and held the admiration and gratitude of the American people. To the officers and enlisted men of both arms of the national service, embracing as an integral part thereof our National Guard and Naval Militia, as well as to all those who are to join them in this heroic struggle, and to their families and dependents, we pledge devoted and constant support and assistance.

Recognizing the duty of every citizen to bear arms or otherwise respond to the call of the country in time of national danger, each citizen doing the special work by which he or she may render the highest service, we urge upon all the willing and prompt acceptance of this duty, regardless of conditions or station in life, recalling with pride the grateful remembrance in which our country has always held its defenders.

The chairman of this meeting, Dr. Henry Suzzallo, is requested to forward to the President of the United States, and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State, a copy of these resolutions.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I submit resolutions adopted by the South Slav Culture and Political Club of Tacoma, Wash., indorsing universal military training, and also two other resolutions which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the South Slav Culture and Political Club of Tacoma, Wash., having as its members men who immigrated to this United States of America seeking refuge and peace from the tyrannous Government of Austria-Hungary, and having enjoyed here freedom and prosperity, in appreciation thereof, at a meeting regularly convened and assembled, as good and loyal citizens, do hereby Resolve, That we do pledge to this Government of the United States of America and to Hon. Woodrow Wilson, the President thereof, our unqualified and steadfast support in this critical time in any action they think best to guard the honor and dignity of this country and the lives and rights of its citizens; and be it further

Resolved, That, being in favor of national preparedness, we do hereby approve and commend the passing of a law by Congress providing for universal military training as proposed by the staff of the United States Army and as set forth in a bill introduced by Senator George G. Chamberlain, of Oregon; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be mailed by our Secretary to the President of the United States and to our Representatives in Congress and to the Jugoslavenska Kancelarija, in Washington, D. C., and that said resolutions be spread at large on the minutes of our club.

SOUTH SLAV CULTURE AND POLITICAL CLUB OF TACOMA, WASH.

Be it resolved by the citizens of Arlington, Wash., in mass meeting assembled, That whereas, pursuant to the recommendations of President Wilson, the Congress of the United States has declared that a state of war now exists between our common country and the Imperial German Government, now therefore we do hereby unequivocally indorse the action of our Government in said declaration; that we esteem the message of the President justified and a declaration of world independence; and be it further

Resolved, That we do hereby tender and pledge our undivided support, irrespective of race, creed, or nationality, to our Government and its constituted authorities in all its branches in vigorous and aggressive defense of not alone our national liberties and existence but equally in defense of democracy against autocracy, freedom versus despotism.

J. A. JACOBSON,
W. F. OLIVER,

BRANCH NO. 852, NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF LETTER CARRIERS,
North Yakima, Wash., April 19, 1917.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We, the members of North Yakima Branch No. 852, National Association of Letter Carriers, believing that the members of the National Association of Letter Carriers, in their work for the betterment of the Postal Service and the condition of the employees, have never in their endeavors forgotten their duty to the Government and the people whom they serve but have always in their work in the time of peace placed duty to their country and department first of all: Therefore be it

Resolved, That in this hour of our Nation's crisis we, the members of North Yakima Branch No. 852, National Association of Letter Carriers, wish to extend to the President of the United States and to our Government our pledge of loyalty and support and pledge ourselves to the performance of any duty that the Government of the United States may deem it wise to call upon us to perform, whether it be in the fulfillment of our civil duties or in active service in the defense of our country; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States and also to each of the Congressmen from this district, and that a copy be made a part of the records of this branch.

Mr. McKELLAR. I present a petition signed by officers of the University of the South, members of the faculty, and residents of Sewanee, Tenn., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH,
Sewanee, Tenn., March 23, 1917.

The Hon. K. D. McKELLAR,
The Hon. JOHN K. SHIELDS,
Senators from Tennessee.

GENTLEMEN: We, the undersigned officers of the University of the South, members of the faculty, or residents of Sewanee, request that you will give your vote for the Chamberlain bill (Senate bill 1695), which provides for a compulsory six months military or naval training for every man at the age of 19, and for a citizen reserve Army and Navy composed of those trained until they reach the age of 28. We who live in the poorest section of our State and who find that many of our citizens are unable to secure education or training of any kind believe that this gratuitous six months course will in particular bring to our poor, isolated mountaineers an increased knowledge of and love for our common country and at the same time foster in them a desire for cleaner, healthier, and more moral living, such as could not have been brought about by our own State authorities unaided in the next 25 years to come.

Henry D. Phenys, Charles Lee Wells, W. H. MacKellar, A. S. Eastman, Wm. H. DuBose, John M. McBryde, jr., D. W. Berky, C. W. Underwood, J. B. Thomas, Thomas P. Bailey, F. S. Houghteling, G. W. Baker, R. C. Walker, J. C. Preston, Telfair Hodgson, Walter Hullihen, S. L. Ware.

Mr. ROBINSON. I present a telegram from the Lions' Club, of Texarkana, Ark., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD together with the signatures.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXARKANA, ARK., April 16, 1917.

Senator JOE ROBINSON,
Washington, D. C.:

The Lions' Club, of Texarkana, unanimously approve your support of the President in the recent war declaration. We also approve the President's plan of raising an army and request our Representatives to support his policy.

R. H. T. MANN,
ALLEN WINHAM,

Resolution adopted at a mass meeting of the members of the Reno Commercial Club Friday, April 6, 1917, at noon.

Be it resolved, That this meeting of citizens of Reno, Nev., are in hearty sympathy with the principles of the League to Enforce Judicial Consideration of International Disputes, so that after the present war is over there may be established permanent peace, and commend the league to the citizens of Nevada in the belief that they will upon understanding thereof be in general accord therewith and see the necessity therefor; and be it further

Resolved, That we know that in this hour of national peril the citizenship of Reno, Nev., and of the West is united in its determination to enter and prosecute vigorous and mighty war against the Imperial German Government, the militaristic dynasty of which has brutally ravished Belgium, has defied the long-established rules of international law, has disregarded the rights of neutrals, has trampled upon the rights of the United States, and while a friendly power violated our hospitality with plots and intrigues, has ruthlessly murdered American citizens upon the high seas, and threatens by its inhuman warfare to tear out the vitals of democracy and destroy the foundations of the civilization of centuries. That we indorse the profoundly great message of President Wilson in which he rightly interprets the ideals of American institutions and manhood, and we pledge the Government of the United States our loyal cooperation in adequately preparing with promptness to meet the issue made by our enemy.

That copies of this resolution be sent by the Chair to President Wilson and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Nevada.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, resolutions adopted at various meetings of citizens of my State.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas our constitutional Representatives, the Congress of the United States has, in pursuance of and in conformity with the high humanitarian and characteristically American policy outlined by our great President, Woodrow Wilson, declared that a state of war now exists between us and the Imperial Government of Germany; and

Whereas under such conditions it became the manifest duty of every American to heartily support the action of his Government and to declare his unswerving loyalty to his country's flag and give public and pronounced expression to his fealty and allegiance to his Nation in its hour of need: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the county board of supervisors for Delta County, Mich., in session assembled hereby affirm, declare, and renew our fealty and allegiance to the Government of the United States of America, and we hereby pledge the hearty and unqualified support of Delta County to the just cause in which the Nation is now engaged, and do hereby unqualifiedly indorse and ratify the action of our Congress in its declaration; and be it further

Resolved, That the county clerk of Delta County spread this resolution upon the records of this meeting, and that he forward a copy hereof to the President of the United States, the United States Senators for Michigan, and to the Congressman from this district.

STATE OF MICHIGAN,
County of Delta, ss:

I, Albert J. Pepin, clerk of the county of Delta, do hereby certify that the foregoing resolutions were adopted by the unanimous vote of the board of supervisors of Delta County, Mich., at a meeting of said board held April 11, 1917.

W. B. SEAMARK, Clerk.

To the honorable BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF LENAWEE COUNTY:

GENTLEMEN: Your committee, to whom was referred the preparation of a resolution expressive of the loyalty and patriotism of the people of this county as we are about to engage in war with one of the greatest military powers in the world, respectfully offer the following resolution:

"Be it resolved by the Board of Supervisors of Lenawee County, Mich., in regular session assembled, That we rejoice, in common with all patriotic Americans, in the splendid declaration of purpose made by our President, that we enter this war for no selfish end, and not alone to secure our rights on land and sea, but also in the interest of humanity and the preservation of Christian civilization, and to restore the rule of right and reason in the earth, to the end that in the future the solemn engagements and treaties of nations shall be observed and respected, and the established rules of international law, made binding upon every nation, great or small, in time of war as well as in time of peace; and

"We, as representatives of the people of this county, do most earnestly affirm and declare that the citizens of Lenawee stand second to none in their steadfast loyalty to their country and in their unswerving determination to give united support to the President as Commander in Chief of our Armies and Navy and to Congress as it gives him every possible measure of aid and assistance in this supreme hour in the life of our Nation.

"We most heartily commend the acts of those Senators and Representatives from Michigan who by voice and vote gave their earnest support to all steps recommended by the President as necessary to enable us to preserve our rights and our honor as a Nation. We do this in the belief that through these measures and others yet to be enacted into law there will be made possible the coming of a lasting peace among all nations; and to this end we do most sincerely urge upon our several Senators and Representatives in the Congress, and especially upon our Representative, Hon. MARK R. BACON, that they each and all give united, vigorous, prompt, and ungrudging support to the measures recommended by those in control of military matters as necessary for the successful conduct of our part in this great conflict.

"The blessings of liberty which we enjoy, the wideness of opportunity here, the security of life and property which this Nation gives to all its sons—whether such by birth or by adoption—entitles it to receive their best service in return, and in the full knowledge of what such service may require we confidently affirm that the people of this county will do their part and meet their every obligation.

"In this connection, however, as representatives of a great agricultural county, we respectfully ask Congress to consider that the system of volunteer enlistments which has obtained in this country in the past has permitted the unselfish sacrifice of more than a just proportion of men from the farms, and we hold that no just apportionment of duty and service is possible under this system alone. We therefore urge our Government, at the very inception of this war, to provide by law a just and equitable system of training, enlistment, and service which will assure us an army of maximum size and efficiency in the shortest possible time, with the least interruption and disorganization of the industries of our country, and in the end to so elevate our ideals or citizenship that where life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness is an universal heritage, universal service—now conceded to be the citizen's duty—will ere long become the patriot's privilege.

"Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded by the secretary of this board to each of our Senators and to our Representative in Congress, and that the same be made a part of the records of this session."

Done at Adrian this 12th day of April, 1917.

OSCAR H. HALLADAY,
JOHN C. HOWELL,
JOHN A. OSBORNE,
Committee.

Mr. HALE presented petitions of sundry citizens of Maine praying for Federal censorship of motion pictures; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. POMERENE. I present several resolutions in the nature of petitions touching the present international situation. I ask that they be incorporated in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the petitions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, April 13, 1917.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Five hundred citizens of Cleveland gathered in a meeting at Glenville High School pledge their unswerving loyalty and support to the President and entreat and urge their Representatives in Congress to vote for the universal military service bill recommended by the administration without delay.

THOMAS COUGHLIN, Chairman.

A. G. A. R. MANIFESTO.

At a special meeting called for that purpose the following communication, reported by Comrade Elroy M. Avery, as a committee of one previously appointed for that purpose was unanimously adopted:

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Greeting:

We, the members of Forest City Post, No. 556, Grand Army of the Republic, on guard at Cleveland, Ohio, salute you.

We thank you for your recent speech to Congress—for every word of it.

We congratulate you (and ourselves) on the prompt response with which it was received by Congress and by the people back of Congress.

We regret that one Ohio Congressman fell short of his glorious opportunity, but allowance must be made for the weaknesses of second childhood.

We sympathize with the loyal people of Wisconsin in the shame undeservedly thrust upon them.

We sympathize with those of our fellow citizens whose hearts are wrung by a war with their Vaterland and yet are loyal to the country of their choice and assure them of our warm friendship for them.

In this holy war of democracy versus autocracy, we who wore the blue clasp the hands of those who wore the gray, and with them pray to the god of battles for leaders as able and as worthy as were Grant and Lee, Sherman and Joe Johnston, Sheridan and Longstreet.

We recognize the fact that the wisdom of the President and Congress is greater than our own, yet we venture to make a few suggestions:

1. The physically strong must fight; the financially strong must pay. Even tainted money, when thus washed in blood, may be made clean.

2. The able-bodied "slacker" must be dragged from his couch of comfort, and the foe within the gates, whether alien or native, must be relentlessly repressed. (See Judges, v., 23, and Gen. Burnside's order No. 38, Department of the Ohio.)

3. Let Old Glory wave on the fighting line beyond the devastated fields and ruined temples of Belgium and of northern France, and forget not that our generous ally of 1776 is almost bleeding white; the transfusion of blood and a supply of the sinews of war are well deserved and have been long enough delayed.

Finally, lead on and we will follow, conscious in advance of what war means in men and money, in suffering on the field or in the trenches and in the agony of bereaved homes, and yet mindful of the fact that without Good Friday there could be no Easter.

God bless you and us.

For the post.

Commander.
T. S. MAXWELL,
Adjutant.

Kindly acknowledge receipt.

Respectfully,

JOHN F. KENAH,
City Clerk.

(By Councilman Eldridge.)

Once more the principles of liberty and justice, the foundation of this Republic, are in danger, and the call to their defense comes to every true American. The President of our United States on the 2d day of April, 1917, delivered a message to the representatives of the States in Congress assembled which is clearly, accurately, and fully expressive of the thought and feeling of the American people toward the people of Germany, and Congress, in conformity with the will of this great people and after mature deliberation, is about to declare a state of war to exist between this Nation and the Imperial German Government; and we being fully appreciative of the gravity of such an act, and knowing no duty but that of loyalty and service to our country: Therefore be it

Resolved by the City Council of the city of Elizabeth, in the State of New Jersey, and each and every member constituting said body, That we approve of the message of the President, delivered by him to Congress on the 2d day of April, 1917, and of the action heretofore taken by the Congress of the United States upon said message.

Further, that we and each of us do hereby pledge our loyalty and assistance to our President and to our country in the crisis that lies before us.

Further, that the clerk transmit copies of these resolutions to the President of the United States and the Representatives of the State of New Jersey in Congress.

Adopted April 5, 1917.

I hereby certify the above to be correct.

Resolved by the members of Mozart Lodge, No. 121, Free and Accepted Masons, of Camden, N. J., That we hereby pledge our loyal support to the Government of the United States of America; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to His Excellency Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America; to the Hon. JOSEPH S. Request you cooperate with Pacific coast Senators in opposition to bill. No disposition on part of Pacific coast shippers to avoid legitimate tolls, but would support bill to prescribe Danube measurement for all ships for purpose of assessing tolls which would give justice to all and not discriminate against American ships.

SANTA CRUZ, CAL., April 10, 1917.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,

Santa Cruz Division of Naval Militia, over 110 strong, is about to depart for headquarters in San Francisco in answer to our country's call. Many have immediate families dependent upon them. The citizens of this community feel it is the imperative duty of Nation to provide by suitable legislation for the acts and needs of such dependent relatives. Any emergency relief will, of course, be taken care of by our citizenship; but there is absolute necessity for legislation along line above suggested. Therefore, on behalf of such dependent relatives, the people of this community strongly urge that you exercise your earnest endeavors to effect such legislation.

Mr. OWEN. I ask to have printed in the RECORD resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of 5,000 citizens of Woodward, Okla.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WOODWARD, OKLA., April 12, 1917.

To Hon. R. L. OWEN,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We, the committee appointed at a mass meeting of 5,000 people at Woodward, April 11, 1917, and charged with the duty of sending the resolutions adopted at that meeting to our honorable Senators and Representatives in Congress for their action, inclose a copy of the said resolutions, and respectfully request that they be presented to the honorable Senate, and, if possible, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Very respectfully,

D. P. MARUM,
C. W. HEROD,
JOHN J. GERLACH,
S. M. SMITH,
Committee.

Resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of the people of Woodward County, Okla.

Whereas our Nation has been forced into war by acts of the German Empire; and

Whereas our national rights have been ruthlessly violated on land and sea; and

Whereas American lives have been taken and plots formulated to destroy our national existence by two powers which were responsible for the Holy Alliance 95 years ago, said alliance having been formed for the purpose of destroying all republican forms of government: Therefore we, the citizens of Woodward County, Okla., in mass meeting assembled this 11th day of April, 1917, in the city of Woodward,

Resolved—

First. That we approve the action of our President and Congress in their declaration of war on the 4th day of April, 1917, against the German Empire.

Second. That we, as loyal Americans, following in the footsteps of our forefathers, hold the enemies of our country to be our enemies and the flag of our country, the Stars and Stripes, to be the flag for which we will fight.

Third. That we pledge the entire resources of our country, even to the last drop of our blood, the last penny of our wealth, in support of our Government in its efforts to vindicate our national honor and preserve for us and all the world the sacred right of self-government.

Fourth. That we ask our Senators and Representatives to give to the President their hearty support in organizing our Army and Navy to be of the highest efficiency, that our national honor may be vindicated and our future peace and prosperity guaranteed for all time to come.

Fifth. That the chairman of this meeting appoint a committee to present these resolutions to our Senators and Representatives, with the request that they be properly presented to the President of the United States and to both Houses of our National Congress as embodying the unanimous sentiment of the people of Woodward County, regardless of the countries of our birth and irrespective of our political affiliations.

FOOD SUPPLIES.

Mr. CALDER. The alarming reports of the rapidly diminishing food supply of the country have brought forth many suggestions relative to the danger of a very great shortage, particularly of wheat, the great staple product of the Nation.

I have read no better statement on the subject than the one contained in the monthly bulletin just issued by the National City Bank of New York. I send it to the desk, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD, and I trust that its further circulation will be the means of informing the people of the country of the very serious problem we are facing.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator from New York what bulletin this is?

Mr. CALDER. It deals with the scarcity of food supplies.

Mr. PENROSE. Is it a lengthy document?

Mr. CALDER. It will cover about a half column of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bulletin was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, April 16, 1917.

TO OUR CORRESPONDENT BANKS AND THE PUBLIC:

In our monthly bulletin we have repeatedly pressed upon public attention the gravity of the situation which now confronts the world in the scarcity of food supplies, but we would not feel that we had done our duty if we did not utter a final word of warning and of appeal upon the subject. The situation grows more serious as spring advances and the disaster to the winter wheat crop of this country is understood.

All of Europe—neutrals as well as warring countries—has been placed upon food rations to eke out supplies until the new crop is harvested. This country entered the present crop year last July with 164,000,000 bushels of wheat carried over from the crop of 1915, and in 1916 produced 482,000,000 bushels of winter wheat and 158,000,000 of spring wheat; total supply, 804,000,000. This year there will be practically no wheat carried over and the Government's estimate upon the winter crop forecasts a yield of only 430,000,000. On this basis the spring wheat crop must be 214,000,000 bushels larger than last year in order to give us a wheat supply equal to what we will export and consume in the crop year now closing. This is an alarming outlook. The spring wheat crop is notoriously subject to weather conditions. More spring wheat should be sown, but it is doubtful if the wheat shortage can be made up. Other food crops must be grown to meet the deficiency.

This country is now at war, and our allies, Belgium, Great Britain, France, and Italy, are dependent upon us for food. They will have no reserves and must have more from us in the coming year than in the past, or they will not be able to feed all their people. Added to the appeals of starving humanity will be military reasons making it impossible for us to put an embargo upon the exportation of food. We must divide what we grow this year with these countries, and with the neutral countries—Holland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, and Spain—which are not self-sustaining in grain supplies. And not only must we supply enough to keep these peoples from starving, but enough to cover the heavy losses at sea which result from the submarine warfare. If we grow no more food than we did last year—and so far the outlook is for less—there is danger of a food situation such as the world in modern times has not dreamed of. No other country has the resources in land and population to meet this emergency but the United States. There is no business upon which all other business depends as upon this of growing a big crop in America this year. And the work must be started immediately. There is no time to wait on organization from outside. The emergency can be met only by spontaneous action in every State, county, and school district forming local organizations.

Picture in your mind what conditions will be in our own cities next winter, and of the effect upon all industry, if food supplies are scarcer and dearer than they are now. It must be impressed upon everybody that no wage advances or regulation of prices can add one bushel of wheat or potatoes to the supply after the growing season is over.

The country is aroused, but mere alarm will not accomplish results. There must be organized personal work, headed in every locality by men of force and influence.

The governor of Iowa has called for the enlistment of boys from 13 to 18 to work either in town gardens or upon the farms. President Wilson says that these boys will be "soldiers of the commissary." There are fine possibilities in this idea. The boys may be brought to feel that they are serving their country as truly as their older brothers who enlist in Army or Navy; and the girls should have a chance as well. They should have a medal to keep as lifelong evidence of their service in the last great war—let us hope—of the world's history.

Some of our correspondent banks are arranging for garden plots for all their clerks. Industrial employers are doing likewise, and will provide seeds and instruction. Organized work of this kind, with suitable supervision, will be most effective. Every employer in your locality should be waited upon by a committee and invited to cooperate in this manner.

Although it is, of course, desirable to increase the farm crops, and especially the spring-wheat crop, it may be that the best chance to increase the food supply is by the intensive cultivation of garden tracts in and adjacent to towns, where labor additional to the regular farm supply can be secured for growing potatoes, beans, onions, etc. Each community is able to go ahead upon this work without help from outside. The aggregate result will depend upon the efficiency of the local organizations.

We take the liberty of addressing not only our own bank correspondents but all bankers, believing that they will be quick to recognize the gravity of the situation and that their relations with the business community are such as to enable them to secure general cooperation. We would appreciate advice as to what is being done in your locality.

Respectfully,

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK.

EXCERPT FROM A LETTER RECEIVED BY AN OFFICER OF THIS BANK FROM SIR GEORGE PAISH, OF LONDON, DATED MARCH 21, 1917.

"I have been endeavoring to form some sort of notion of the world's supplies of food, both this season and next, and have come to the conclusion that if the American people will continue to help the world to get through this time of great stress and strain by (1) growing as much food as possible, and (2) themselves consuming no more than absolutely essential the world will weather through, although the margin of safety will be very slender. Would it be possible for the ladies of America to start an economy campaign for the benefit of the women and children, not of Belgium only but practically of the entire world, for it is evident that many a poor family will not be able to buy food in the coming 12 or 18 months in consequence of its dearness and scarcity unless those women who can afford to pay high prices voluntarily deny themselves and share the food which Providence provides with their poorer sisters? If they do this, then the heart of the world will beat with that mother love which is all powerful for good and which will prevent the recurrence of such a disaster as that now threatening the human race.

"The need of humanity is great.

"The heart of America is also great."

If the above quotation, from the editor of the London Statist and one of the best-known economists in England, is read in schools and published in local newspapers, it would doubtless assist in creating public interest.

GIFT OF YACHT "OWERA."

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I am the owner of the steam yacht Owera, a ship of about 195 feet over all and of 426 gross tons. Some time ago I offered this vessel to the Navy Department for the duration of the war. When, however, it came to entering into an agreement with the department, I found that because I was a United States Senator I was precluded by statute from doing so. As a matter of fact, if I allowed the Government to take the Owera I would be guilty of a penal offense.

I am therefore sending to the desk a bill authorizing me to enter into a contract with the Secretary of the Navy in behalf of the United States for the use of this yacht and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. Let me add that the department would like to have her and have indorsed this bill.

The bill (S. 1845) to authorize Peter Goelet Gerry to enter into a contract with the Secretary of the Navy, in behalf of the United States, for the use of the steam yacht Owera, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ISSUANCE OF BONDS.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to offer an amendment to House bill 2762. It is very short, and I ask to have it printed in the RECORD. I shall call it up when the bill is reached.

There being no objection the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 6, section 6, lines 18 and 19, strike out the words "to borrow from time to time on the credit of the United States";
On line 20, same page, strike out the words "such sum or sums as";
On page 6, line 21, strike out the words "in his judgment may be necessary, and"; also the word "therefor," in the same line; strike out all of lines 23 and 24, page 7, together with the word "annum" on line 25;
On line 26, page 6, strike out the words "with the interest accrued thereon";
On line 3, page 7, strike out the word "not";
So that section 6, as proposed to be amended will read as follows:
"SEC. 6. That in addition to the bonds authorized by sections 1 and 4 of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized for the purposes of this act and to meet public expenditures authorized by law to issue certicates of indebtedness at not less than par in such form as he may prescribe; and each certificate so issued shall be payable at such time, not exceeding one year from the date of its issue, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. Certificates of indebtedness herein authorized shall bear the circulation privilege and the sum of such certificates outstanding shall at no time exceed in the aggregate $2,000,000,000."

JOINT PEACE CONVENTION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit a resolution, which I send to the desk and ask that it may go over under the rule after it has been read.

The resolution (S. Res. 38) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of State be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered, under the direction of the President, to conclude a convention with the allied powers, binding them, and each of them, and the United States as well, not to make a separate peace with the German Government, with which the United States is now at war, nor with any of the allies of the German Government; and that such peace, when concluded, shall only be by the joint action of the United States and the Governments with which it wages war against the German Government and any other Governments which may be joined with Germany as an ally, either now or hereafter.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will change the request and ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 40), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Woman Suffrage or any subcommittee thereof be authorized to employ a stenographer, at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee.

APPEAL TO THE COUNTRY BY THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. THOMPSON. I present a copy of the text of the President's proclamation of April 16, 1917, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF THE PRESIDENT'S PROCLAMATION.

MY FELLOW COUNTRYMEN: The entrance of our own beloved country into the grim and terrible war for democracy and human rights which has shaken the world creates so many problems of national life and action which call for immediate consideration and settlement that I hope you will permit me to address to you a few words of earnest counsel and appeal with regard to them.

We are rapidly putting our Navy upon an effective war footing, and are about to create and equip a great Army, but these are the simplest parts of the great task to which we have addressed ourselves. There is not a single selfish element, so far as I can see, in the cause we are fighting for. We are fighting for what we believe and wish to be the rights of mankind and for the future peace and security of the world. To do this great thing worthily and successfully we must devote ourselves to the service without regard to profit or material advantage and with an energy and intelligence that will rise to the level of the enterprise itself. We must realize to the full how great the task is and how many things, how many kinds and elements of capacity and self-sacrifice it involves.

These, then, are the things we must do, and do well, besides fighting—the things without which mere fighting would be fruitless.

We must supply abundant food for ourselves and for our armies and our seamen not only, but also for a large part of the nations with whom we have now made common cause, in whose support and by whose sides we shall be fighting.

We must supply ships by the hundreds out of our shipyards to carry to the other side of the sea—submarines or no submarines—what will every day be needed there, and abundant materials out of our fields and our mines and our factories with which not only to clothe and equip our own forces on land and sea but also to clothe and support our people for whom the gallant fellows under arms can no longer work, to help clothe and equip the armies with which we are cooperating in Europe, and to keep the looms and manufactories there in raw material; coal to keep the fires going in ships at sea and in the furnaces of hundreds of factories across the sea; steel out of which to make arms and ammunition both here and there; rails for worn-out railways back of the fighting fronts; locomotives and rolling stock to take the place of those every day going to pieces; mules, horses, cattle for labor and for military service; everything with which the people of England and France and Italy and Russia have usually supplied themselves, but can not now afford the men, the materials, or the machinery to make.

It is evident to every thinking man that our industries, on the farms, in the shipyards, in the mines, in the factories, must be made more prolific and more efficient than ever and that they must be more economically managed and better adapted to the particular requirements of our task than they have been; and what I want to say is that the men and the women who devote their thought and their energy to these things will be serving the country and conducting the fight for peace and freedom just as truly and just as effectively as the men on the battle field or in the trenches. The industrial forces of the country, men and women alike, will be a great national, a great international, service army—a notable and honored host engaged in the service of the Nation and the world, the efficient friends and saviors of free men everywhere. Thousands, nay, hundreds of thousands, of men otherwise liable to military service will of right and of necessity be excused from that service and assigned to the fundamental, sustaining work of the fields and factories and mines, and they will be as much part of the great patriotic forces of the Nation as the men under fire.

I take the liberty, therefore, of addressing this word to the farmers of the country and to all who work on the farms: The supreme need of our own Nation and of the nations with which we are cooperating is an abundance of supplies, and especially of foodstuffs. The importance of an adequate food supply, especially for the present year, is superlative. Without abundant food, alike for the armies and the peoples now at war, the whole great enterprise upon which we have embarked will break down and fail. The world's food reserves are low. Not only during the present emergency but for some time after peace shall have come both our own people and a large proportion of the people of Europe must rely upon the harvests in America. Upon the farmers of this country, therefore, in large measure rests the fate of the war and the fate of the nations. May the Nation not count upon them to omit no step that will increase the production of their land or that will bring about the most effectual cooperation in the sale and distribution of their products? The time is short. It is of the most imperative importance that everything possible be done and done immediately to make sure of large harvests. I call upon young men and old alike and upon the able-bodied boys of the land to accept and act upon this duty—to turn in hosts to the farms and make certain that no pains and no labor is lacking in this great matter.

I particularly appeal to the farmers of the South to plant abundant foodstuffs as well as cotton. They can show their patriotism in no better or more convincing way than by resisting the great temptation of the present price of cotton and helping, helping upon a great scale, to feed the Nation and the peoples everywhere who are fighting for their liberties and for our own. The variety of their crops will be the visible measure of their comprehension of their national duty.

The Government of the United States and the governments of the several States stand ready to cooperate. They will do everything possible to assist farmers in securing an adequate supply of seed, an adequate force of laborers when they are most needed, at harvest time, and the means of expediting shipments of fertilizers and farm machinery, as well as of the crops themselves when harvested. The course of trade shall be as unhampered as it is possible to make it and there shall be no unwarranted manipulation of the Nation's food supply by those who handle it on its way to the consumer. This is our opportunity to demonstrate the efficiency of a great democracy, and we shall not fall short of it.

This let me say to the middlemen of every sort, whether they are handling our foodstuffs or our raw material of manufacture or the products of our mills and factories: The eyes of the country will be especially upon you. This is your opportunity for signal service, efficient and disinterested. The country expects you, as it expects all others, to forego unusual profits, to organize and expedite shipments of supplies of every kind, but especially of food, with an eye to the service you are rendering and in the spirit of those who enlist in the ranks, for their people, not for themselves. I shall confidently expect you to deserve and win the confidence of people of every sort and station.

To the men who run the railways of the country, whether they be managers or operative employees, let me say that the railways are the arteries of the Nation's life and that upon them rests the immense responsibility of seeing to it that those arteries suffer no obstruction of any kind, no inefficiency or slackened power. To the merchant let me suggest the motto, "Small profits and quick service," and to the shipbuilder the thought that the life of the war depends upon him. The food and the war supplies must be carried across the seas no matter how many ships are sent to the bottom. The places of those that go down must be supplied at once. To the miner let me say that he stands where the farmer does; the work of the world waits on him. If he slackens or fails, armies and statesmen are helpless. He also is enlisted in the great service army. The manufacturer does not need to be told, I hope, that the Nation looks to him to speed and perfect every process; and I want only to remind his employees that their service is absolutely indispensable and is counted on by every man who loves the country and its liberties.

Let me suggest, also, that everyone who creates or cultivates a garden helps, and helps greatly, to solve the problem of the feeding of the nations; and that every housewife who practices strict economy puts herself in the ranks of those who serve the Nation. This is the time for America to correct her unpardonable fault of wastefulness and extravagance. Let every man and every woman assume the duty of careful, provident use and expenditure as a public duty, as a dictate of patriotism which no one can now expect ever to be excused or forgiven for ignoring.

In the hope that this statement of the needs of the Nation and of the world in this hour of supreme crisis may stimulate those to whom it comes and remind all who need reminder of the solemn duties of a time such as the world has never seen before, I beg that all editors and publishers everywhere will give as prominent publication and as wide circulation as possible to this appeal. I venture to suggest, also, to all advertising agencies that they would perhaps render a very substantial and timely service to the country if they would give it widespread repetition. And I hope that clergymen will not think the theme of it an unworthy or inappropriate subject of comment and homily from their pulpits.

The supreme test of the Nation has come. We must all speak, act, and serve together!

WOODROW WILSON.

APRIL 16, 1917.

ADDRESS BY CLARK W. HETHERINGTON.

Mr. THOMAS. I am in possession of an address recently delivered by Clark W. Hetherington, professor of physical education and recreation of the University of Wisconsin, the title of which is "Shall Military Training be Given Our Youth?" It is a very thoughtful and valuable contribution to the literature of the subject. I ask that it be printed as a Senate document and that it be referred to the Committee on Printing for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

WASHINGTON RAILWAY & ELECTRIC CO.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I do not think that I should serve upon the committee created under resolution No. 23, because Mrs. Gerry is interested in some securities in Washington, and I have not yet been able to find out whether they are connected with this corporation. Further, owing to my work in the Committees on Finance and Naval Affairs, I feel that I would not have the proper time to give to the investigation. I ask, therefore, that I may be excused from serving upon this special committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Rhode Island will be excused, and the Chair will appoint in his stead the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

ISSUANCE OF BONDS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill 2762, known as the bond bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2762) to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and to extend credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Secretary to read the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I wish to make just a statement. I wish to say, Mr. President, that I voted to report this bill, and I expect to vote for its passage. I think the bill should have been framed upon different lines——

Mr. SIMMONS. Would the Senator object to letting the bill be read before he proceeds?

Mr. STONE. I wish to make a statement before it is read. It is only a word or two.

I think it is entirely proper to say that I submitted to the Committee on Finance a somewhat different line for raising the revenues necessary for the prosecution of the war. The view I expressed was not apparently agreed to or even sympathized with by the committee.

This is a war measure, and I then accepted the judgment of the committee, as I do now; but I desire a little later on to express to the Senate my views of the lines that should have been followed by the committee. I do not file any objections to the bill itself—I expect to vote for it—but I reserve the right to state my individual views with respect to the plan which should have been adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 2762) to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and to extend credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized to borrow, from time to time, on the credit of the United States for the purposes of this act, and to meet expenditures authorized for the national security and defense and other public purposes authorized by law, not exceeding in the aggregate $5,000,000,000, exclusive of the sums authorized by section 4 of this act, and to issue therefor bonds of the United States.

The bonds herein authorized shall be in such form and subject to such terms and conditions of issue, conversion, redemption, maturities, payment, and rate and time of payment of interest, not exceeding 3½ per cent per annum, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. The principal and interest thereof shall be payable in United States gold coin of the present standard of value, and shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation imposed by authority of the United States, or its possessions, or by authority of any State, except estate or inheritance taxes; but such bonds shall not bear the circulation privilege.

The bonds herein authorized shall first be offered at not less than par as a popular loan, under such regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury as will give all citizens of the United States an equal opportunity to participate therein; and any portion of the bonds so offered and not subscribed for may be otherwise disposed of at not less than par by the Secretary of the Treasury; but no commissions shall be allowed or paid on any bonds issued under authority of this act.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and prosecuting the war by establishing credits in the United States for foreign Governments the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to purchase at par from such foreign Governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States their obligations hereafter issued, bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act; to enter into such arrangements as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for purchasing such obligations of foreign Governments and for the subsequent payment thereof before maturity, but such arrangements shall provide that if any of the bonds of the United States issued and used for the purchase of such foreign obligations shall thereafter be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 3½ per cent per annum under the provisions of section 5 of this act, then and in that event the obligations of such foreign Governments held by the United States shall be, by such foreign Governments, converted in like manner and extent into obligations bearing the same rate of interest as the bonds of the United States issued under the provisions of section 5 of this act. For the purposes of this section there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That the authority granted by this section to the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase bonds from foreign Governments as aforesaid shall cease upon the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury, under such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, is hereby authorized to receive on or before maturity payment for any obligations of such foreign Governments purchased on behalf of the United States, and to sell at not less than the purchase price any of such obligations and to apply the proceeds thereof and any payments made by foreign Governments on account of their said obligations to the redemption or purchase at not more than par and accrued interest of any bonds of the United States issued under authority of this act; and if such bonds are not available for this purpose the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem or purchase any other outstanding interest-bearing obligations of the United States which may at such time be subject to call or which may be purchased at not more than par and accrued interest.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is hereby authorized to issue the bonds not already issued heretofore authorized by section 39 of the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes"; section 124 of the act approved June 3, 1916, entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes"; section 13 of the act of September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a United States shipping board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and a naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries, to regulate carriers by water engaged in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States, and for other purposes"; section 400 of the act approved March 3, 1917, entitled "An act to provide increased revenue to defray the expenses of the increased appropriations for the Army and Navy and the extensions of fortifications, and for other purposes"; and the public resolution approved March 4, 1917 entitled "Joint resolution to expedite the delivery of materials, equipment, and munitions, and to secure more expeditious construction of ships," in the manner and under the terms and conditions prescribed in section 1 of this act.

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States from time to time, in addition to the sum authorized in section 1 of this act, such additional amount, not exceeding $63,945,460, as may be necessary to redeem the 3 per cent loan of 1908 to 1918, maturing August 1, 1918, and to issue therefor bonds of the United States in the manner and under the terms and conditions prescribed in section 1 of this act.

SEC. 5. That any series of bonds issued under authority of sections 1 and 4 of this act may, under such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, be convertible into bonds bearing a higher rate of interest than the rate at which the same were issued if any subsequent series of bonds shall be issued at a higher rate of interest on or before December 31, 1918.

SEC. 6. That in addition to the bonds authorized by sections 1 and 4 of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to borrow from time to time, on the credit of the United States, for the purposes of this act and to meet public expenditures authorized by law, such sum or sums as, in his judgment, may be necessary, and to issue therefor certificates of indebtedness at not less than par in such form and subject to such terms and conditions and at such rate of interest, not exceeding 3½ per cent per annum, as he may prescribe; and each certificate so issued shall be payable, with the interest accrued thereon, at such time, not exceeding one year from the date of its issue, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. Certificates of indebtedness herein authorized shall not bear the circulation privilege, and the sum of such certificates outstanding shall at no time exceed in the aggregate $2,000,000,000.

SEC. 7. That in order to pay all necessary expenses, including rent, connected with any operations under this act a sum not exceeding one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of bonds and one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of certificates of indebtedness herein authorized is hereby appropriated, or as much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct.

MEASUREMENT OF VESSELS FOR IMPOSITION OF TOLLS.

Mr. SIMMONS obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me to submit a request for unanimous consent to have a bill recommitted to a committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Washington for that purpose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The bill to which I refer is the bill (S. 831) providing that the Panama Canal rules shall govern in the measurement of vessels for imposing tolls. It is a bill in which many of the people of my State are much interested, and they are very desirous of having an opportunity to be heard upon it. For that purpose I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be recommitted to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. I will say that such action will cause no delay, because the people to whom I refer are ready to be heard at any time the committee may fix.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, with that understanding, I offer no objection to the recommittal of the bill. It is a very important measure, and I shall expect the Senator from Washington to have his constituents here at once and a meeting of the committee to be had immediately for the hearing which he desires, in order that the bill may again be speedily acted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] that Senate bill 831 may be taken from the calendar and recommitted to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

COMMISSIONERS TO NATIONS WARRING AGAINST GERMANY.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me in order that I may introduce a joint resolution and have it referred to a committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course; I have no objection to yielding to the Senator from Washington for the purpose of introducing a resolution.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I send to the desk a joint resolution, which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 37) for appointment of special war commissioners to Great Britain, France, Italy, and Russia was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Joint resolution for appointment of special war commissioners to Great Britain, France, Italy, and Russia.

Resolved, etc., That the President shall forthwith appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for the duration of the war in which the United States is now engaged, a commissioner from the Government of the United States to the Government of Great Britain, a commissioner from the Government of the United States to the Government of France, a commissioner from the Government of the United States to the Government of Italy, and a commissioner from the Government of the United States to the Government of Russia. Each of said commissioners shall receive a salary of $20,000 a year and his necessary traveling expenses, and shall hold his office subject to the power of the President to remove him therefrom. It shall be the duty of said commissioners to confer with the Governments of the several countries to which they are assigned as to the best and most effective means of cooperation by the United States in the war, to obtain such information toward that end as may be available, and to aid the President of the United States, under his instruction, in bringing about such a coordination of resources and measures of the United States with all the countries now engaged in war with Germany, as may tend toward the successful prosecution of that war. Naval or military officers of the United States shall be eligible for appointment as such commissioners, in which case such appointment shall not interfere in any way with the irregular tenure of such military or naval officer, and while acting as such commissioner the total salary of such military or naval officer shall be that provided herein for such commissioner. The powers and duties of such commissioners shall be plenipotentiary within the purposes herein specified, but shall not otherwise interfere with the powers or duties of the regular ambassadors of the United States to the several countries herein mentioned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to make an inquiry of the Senate. The rules provide:

It shall not be in order to interrupt a Senator having the floor for the purpose of introducing any memorial, petition, report of a committee, resolution, or bill. It shall be the duty of the Chair to enforce this rule without any point of order hereunder being made by a Senator.

Does the Senate want that rule enforced?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I think so.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, before the enforcement of the rule is begun I will say that unofficially I have the consent of the Senator from North Carolina to submit a resolution and have it referred without reading. After that I am strongly in favor of the enforcement of the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This rule ought to be repealed. No attention has been paid to it for the last two years, and every time the Chair has undertaken to enforce the rule some Senator has taken umbrage at the Chair for making the suggestion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator from New Jersey has asked for permission to violate the rule again. I think that rule ought to be enforced. Of course, we all violate it, and in what I say I do not reflect upon one Senator any more than another, or upon other Senators any more than upon myself.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, rather than yield to a debate I will not yield to the Senator from New Jersey to submit his resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the resolution of the Senator from New Jersey be received and then start fresh.

Mr. BORAH. I wanted to add my moral support to the Vice President.

Mr. HUGHES. Out of order, I ask permission to submit the resolution which I send to the desk.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 39) was read and referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That after a bill or joint resolution shall have been reported to the Senate from the Committee of the Whole no Senator shall, without unanimous consent, speak for more than one hour on the bill nor for more than 10 minutes on any amendment, and that all such debate shall be pertinent and relevant to the subject under discussion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In order that there may be no complaint of the Vice President, as it is his plain duty, the Vice President is going to enforce that rule from this time forward, and Senators will save time by not interrupting a Senator who has the floor to introduce morning business.

ISSUANCE OF BONDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2762) to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and to extend credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it is proper that in calling up this very important measure I should make a brief and general statement to the Senate and to the country with reference to its main features.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to issue $5,000,000,000 of bonds of the United States. Three billions of this amount is to be used by the Secretary in the purchase of the bonds of countries engaged in war with our enemies for the purpose of providing for them credit here and elsewhere to assist in the prosecution of the war. These bonds which we are to buy are to be in all essential particulars similar—I might say, identical—with the bonds which we are to issue ourselves. They are to bear the same rate of interest. They are to mature substantially at the same time. If there is any change made in the interest rate of the bonds issued by us, a like change is to be provided for in the bonds which we purchase from our allies.

The other two billions of this total issue of five billions are to be used for the purposes of prosecuting the war on the part of this Government, for the purposes of national security and national defense. Of course, the money is not to be used, except as it may be appropriated by law.

The bill also provides for the issuance of about $63,000,000 worth of bonds to liquidate and pay off bonds of that amount issued during the Spanish-American War, which will fall due in August, 1918, and will then have to be paid.

Heretofore we have authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to issue in all, I think, $472,000,000 of bonds—$222,000,000 of Panama bonds, and new bonds for the difference between that sum and the total sum which I have just stated. This money, as we very well understand, is for purposes heretofore approved by Congress. No additional authority of issue is given in this bill as to the above amount; but the conversion privilege which we provide in the bill for these $5,000,000,000 is to be extended to this $63,000,000 and to this $472,000,000.

The conversion privilege provided in this bill is this: If at any time between now and the 31st day of December, 1918, the Government shall issue bonds bearing a higher rate of interest than the bonds provided for in this bill, the holders of the bonds now to be issued will be given the privilege of converting their bonds into bonds bearing the higher rate of interest; and this privilege is extended to these other bonds which I have mentioned, when they shall have been issued. The purpose of extending this privilege to these other bonds is manifest. It would be difficult to sell them at the rate of interest prescribed in the present law, which is 3 per cent, while other bonds of the Government are selling for 3½ per cent. Indeed the conditions which confront us make it quite likely that we will have in the near future to issue another large block of bonds, and if it were known that the interest on the future issues will be, as it likely will have to be, still higher, it would add to the difficulty of floating these bonds at this time if no conversion privilege were given.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to ask the Senator if he has reference to the bonds mentioned in section 4?

Mr. SIMMONS. I did have reference to those, in part; yes.

Mr. CURTIS. Can the Senator tell the Senate the amount covered by section 4? I understood the Senator to say about $472,000,000. As originally reported, if we include the sixty-three millions, it runs up to about $535,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. The $472,000,000 does not include the $63,000,000.

Mr. CURTIS. It does not? That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether the Secretary of the Treasury has made a mistake in reporting to the committee the amount of Panama bonds that is unissued or not; but the Senator will remember that when, at the last session, the bill providing revenue was under discussion the same question arose. The committee of the House reported then that there was $222,000,000 worth of Panama bonds still available to be issued. The same committee reports the same amount of Panama bonds authorized to be issued to-day and takes that figure and adds it to the $100,000,000 and the $150,000,000 authorized by special act of Congress, making $472,000,000 worth of bonds to be taken up as soon as the 3½ per cent bonds are issued. Now, I do not know that it makes any particular difference——

Mr. SIMMONS. It makes no difference at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Because I think that under the bill itself the Treasury will be authorized to take up all of them, no matter what amount they are; but in order that there may be no mistake I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is still a balance of bonds authorized but not issued, speaking of the Panama Canal bonds, of $240,569,000, instead of $222,000,000. I do this for the RECORD, Mr. President. I am quite sure that it does not make any difference, as far as the bill is concerned, because the bill authorizes the taking up of all of the Panama Canal bonds, or converting them into the new bonds.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I rise to express the hope that the Senator from North Carolina may be permitted to proceed with and conclude his statement without further interruption. I am sure the Senate will get a very much better understanding of the matter if he is permitted to proceed in that way and if Senators will withhold their suggestions and questions until his remarks are concluded.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Missouri for that suggestion, although I have but very little more to say about this matter.

The Senator from Utah made during the last session the point which he now makes with reference to the amount of Panama bonds which are still available for issue. I did not then have any definite information further than a statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, and I have none now; but I think that matter is wholly immaterial, in view of the fact that the Secretary can not issue any greater amount of bonds than are necessary to cover the expenses provided for by law. If there are more of the Panama bonds available than we have thought, then the amount that will have to be taken care of by new bonds will be less. If there are less of the Panama bonds than we thought, then the amount that will have to be taken care of by new bonds will be greater. So I think it is not a material or a practical question.

Mr. President, the bill further provides for an issue by the Secretary of the Treasury, as they may be needed, of the sum of $2,000,000,000 in certificates of indebtedness. The certificates are to bear the same rate of interest as the bonds, but they are not to run for a longer period than one year. The purpose of giving this authority I think will be clear to the Senators when they consider the fact that a large part of the taxes that we have heretofore provided for preparedness purposes and a large part of the tax which it is probable we will hereafter levy for war purposes, will not become due in the manner in which our tariff taxes and our internal-revenue taxes, upon which heretofore we have relied to support the Government, have become due—that is, regularly from month to month—but nearly the whole of them will become due during the last months of the fiscal year, giving rise during the other months of the fiscal year to a condition in the Treasury which might become embarrassing unless the Secretary were authorized to make temporary loans for the purpose of securing the money to meet the expenses of the Government, to be refunded or paid when the taxes are due. Then, Mr. President, of course there may be, as there frequently has been in the past, a miscalculation as to the amount that will be realized from taxes imposed; and in view of that it will be necessary for the Secretary to have some authority to provide against that contingency.

In the business in which we are about to engage, especially unless Congress shall remain in continuous session, it seems to me that every consideration of prudence requires that we should so arm the Secretary of the Treasury with authority with reference to quickly securing money that the operations of the Government would not be liable to embarrassment by reason of a lack of funds in the Treasury. Of course, Mr. President, it is not provided when he shall issue these certificates; it is not provided how many of these certificates he shall issue; but, trusting the Secretary and the President in this matter as we have trusted them in practically all the other essential things except the interest rate on the bonds, we give him full and plenary authority to issue these certificates to meet any indebtedness that has been authorized by law and which the Treasury has not the money to meet otherwise than by a loan.

Mr. President, I might as well state here—it is not in the bill as it came from the House, but your committee has recommended that it be incorporated in the bill—the fact that it was thought wise by the Secretary and by the committee to enlarge somewhat the authority of the department with reference to the deposit in the financial institutions of the country of such funds as might come into the Treasury as the result of this great bond sale; and your committee has prepared an amendment providing that the Secretary of the Treasury may deposit this money, upon the usual terms, in any of the banks or the trust companies of the country, to be selected by him.

Any other provision to which I probably should refer is that providing for the expenses of these issues. The bill as originally reported by the Ways and Means Committee provided for one-fifth of 1 per cent upon the bonds and one-tenth of 1 per cent upon the certificates of indebtedness. Objection was made on the floor of the House to the amount allowed for floating the bonds, and the House reduced the amount from one-fifth to one-tenth of 1 per cent. The Secretary of the Treasury is of the opinion that this amount may not be sufficient, but the Finance Committee, though somewhat reluctantly, decided to accept the House rate and hope the effort I am advised may be made to further reduce this amount will not prevail.

I have confined myself in this statement to a general explanation of the terms of the bill. I do not know whether that was necessary, because the bill has been read to the Senate; but as there has been very little time for the investigation and consideration of this matter since the bill was reported, I thought probably it would be some help to the Senate for me to make a brief, concrete statement as to the essential provisions contained in the bill.

Mr. President, I think the general purposes and objects of this great bond issue, the greatest that has ever been proposed in this or in any country in the world, at any time in the history of the world, are known and understood by practically all the people of this country. I think the purposes embodied in this legislation are not only known and understood, but have the hearty approval and sanction of the great mass and body of the American people. I do not think that there is any longer necessity to discuss the determination of the American people which lies behind this legislation and which has prompted it and carried it through the other House by a vote without a dissenting voice, and which I hope will take it through this House by a vote without a dissenting voice.

The time for discussion, certainly for discussion of the purpose of the American people, has passed. The time for action has arrived. The decree has been entered solemnly after long hesitation and much deliberation. After reflection, study, discussion on the floor of Congress and in all the vehicles of publicity throughout the country, the people have decided to take the step which has been taken. What the people desire now is that everything necessary to give effect to their purpose, as declared in the act of Congress, shall be done, and done with that quickness and dispatch which the exigencies of the situation demand. With this object and end in view, solemnly the Congress of the United States, speaking for the American people and reflecting their judgment and purpose, pledged to the Commander in Chief of the armies and the navies of the United States, in carrying out their mandate, all the resources of the country.

The step has been taken. The time for counting the cost and the consequences is past. We must press forward. We must get solidly behind the administration. Our pledges of support must be backed by action; the Commander in Chief of the forces of the United States must have at his control every resource of men and money required to bring the great undertaking in which we are now engaged to a successful issue.

Time, therefore, has become of the very essence of the great business in which we are engaged. I trust that we will take counsel from the warning of Britain's great premier when a few days ago he expressed the hope we would not make the mistake which the allies had made in ignoring time as a prime factor in the great work we have undertaken.

Since we have entered upon this thing, let us put aside all doubts and avoid the dangers of procrastination. Let us do whatever is necessary for our own preparedness to help our allies across the water to more effectually fight their battles and our battles.

Mr. President, I had hoped, and I still hope, that before this day ends, before the Senate again adjourns, we shall pass this bill. I do not know anything that we can do at this time which will give so much hope, so much comfort, so much confidence to our allies who are in the travails of war as prompt and united and whole-hearted action in the passage of this measure. It will convey to them the unmistakable assurance and guaranty that the United States has embarked on this matter in earnest; that there is to be no halting, no back stepping; that all our strength and all our resources, at whatever cost of money or sacrifice of life and human comfort, are to be thrown in the scale with them in the great fight that they are making across the water in behalf of liberty, in behalf of humanity, in behalf of that vital principle out of which the American Union sprang, the principle of representative government.

I do not think we can do anything that will bring discouragement, that will carry greater terror to the hearts and so paralyze the energies of those who fight to maintain that discarded and hated principle of autocracy among men, so certainly, so surely, as a whole-hearted, a quick response to the call that is now made upon us for money to prepare ourselves and to aid our allies in the great contest in which we are jointly engaged.

Mr. President, in these circumstances to vote for this measure to provide the means to carry out our pledges and to do the things we have commanded the chief of our armies and navies to do in our name—to vote the necessary money to do these things and do it in a way that will be a guarantee to the allies of our purpose to continue to do whatever may be necessary for the success of our cause and their cause to the very end—I esteem an act of patriotism, duty, and high privilege.

When the two great statesmen Great Britain and France have sent to this country, who now occupy seats in the cabinets of their respective Governments, shall arrive here to-morrow, accompanied by some of the great military and naval chieftains of their respective nations, for the purpose of conferring with the President as to how we may best cooperate together for the accomplishment of our common purpose in this high undertaking in which we are now jointly enlisted, I earnestly hope we shall be able to say to them, "To aid you and to prepare and equip ourselves to efficiently do our part in the great struggle we have just passed, by a unanimous vote of both Houses of Congress, the greatest budget that has ever been enacted by the legislation of any nation in the world, a budget that carries many times more money than your first war budget and your second war budget and perhaps your third war budget put together, a sum so stupendous that it staggers the imagination and mind of man."

I hope we shall be able to say to them "Wire back the tidings to the boys in the trenches; wire back the tidings to Russia, now in the throes and chaos of revolutions; wire back the tidings to the struggling heroes of Belgium and Italy and France that the great Republic of the west is unitedly with them with all of its great strength of men and money to the end."

If we can do that, Mr. President, I think some of the troubles that threaten the European situation, some of the troubles that have given concern and apprehension to our allies, will be at once remedied, will be at once relieved, and that the war in Europe will be conducted perhaps upon a plane and with a spirit that has probably been heretofore lacking on the part of some of our allies.

Mr. President, there is probably but little else we can now do to help our allies. We have not the men to send over there at present to help fight our battles; our Navy possibly can be of but very little use in present conditions. It will be long, weary months of waiting before we shall be able to render much assistance to our allies in the field. The help this bill offers is an earnest and a guaranty which carries hope and assurance of greater assistance and helpfulness in the future. It will assure them that in this great cause we stand ready to risk life and fortune. Let us do this heartily, cordially, unanimously, and without hesitation; let us do it in the spirit of men who thoroughly understand and comprehend the great cause in which we are fighting, the great thing that we are undertaking, and who are entering into it without thought of profit, without thought of financial loss, without thought of the bodily discomfort, without thought of the sacrifice, but ready and willing to make every sacrifice, even of our lives and our fortunes, in defense of our outraged rights in the cause of democracy and humanity throughout the broad expanse of the earth.

Mr. PENROSE obtained the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question before the Senator from Pennsylvania proceeds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KNOX in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. PENROSE. I yield for a question, but do not yield the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. May I make an inquiry of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] in regard to section 5 of the pending bill? I desire to ask the Senator if in the legislation of the Spanish-American War or of the War Between the States there was any similar provision, or if the allies in the issuing of their bonds have any similar provision contained in the acts authorizing their bond issues? I refer to the section relative to the conversion of these bonds into bonds drawing a higher rate of interest if we should later on issue such bonds. Can the Senator from North Carolina state whether or not there has been any precedent for this proposed legislation?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will permit me, I will say my impression is that practically the legislation of all of these foreign powers contains similar provisions in reference to their bond issues.

Mr. LODGE. They all have it.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is thought necessary, and I think is necessary.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that all such legislation contains the conversion privilege.

Mr. NORRIS. But have we so provided heretofore? For instance, in the legislation relative to the Spanish-American War did we have any such provision?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; but, as the Senator from Nebraska knows, that was a small scrap that we got into, and no one supposed it would require very much money. Consequently, there was no anticipation that in the near future there would have to be large additional bond issues for that purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator from North Carolina—I am asking this question purely for information—it seemed to me on first blush that section 5 was unnecessary and would only result in our being compelled to pay a higher rate of interest on the bonds that had already been sold; and I wondered whether or not we had ever previously enacted similar legislation.

Mr. SIMMONS. No, Mr. President, we have never previously passed such legislation, for the reason that there never has been an occasion which seemed to demand that it be enacted or which seemed to make it necessary that it be done.

I think, however, that it has been the experience of the European Governments that it has been found necessary, in order to float subsequent bonds, to raise the rate of interest, and as the total amount of the bond issue increased that the interest has been constantly raised. That will likely be our experience. Now, can not the Senator from Nebraska see that if we do not in this first issue provide for giving investors the benefit of any higher rate that we may have to pay hereafter, in a very short time there would be great hesitation on the part of capital to invest and a disposition to wait until the exigencies of the Government were greater, when they probably might be able to get a higher rate of interest; and in the anticipation and hope of getting a higher rate of interest they would merely keep out of the market for the present, so that there might be an utter failure on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury to float the present issue. It was that situation and that attitude of the human mind—especially the mind of the investing public—which led to the suggestion that in this respect we should follow the precedent set by the other Governments engaged in war.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, supplementing what the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has stated in reply to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], although the inquiry was not addressed to me, I will say it is very evident to those conversant with these financial matters that this loan can not be floated unless this conversion privilege is accorded the bonds.

Mr. President, I do not intend to detain the Senate at this time with any prolonged observations upon the pending bill. The Committee on Finance, with practical unanimity, reserving personal opinion and reserving the right to vote on details, agreed to report the measure, and the chairman of the committee has stated in a general way the purposes of this loan bill, which has passed the House unanimously, according to my recollection, with one Member not voting.

It is well known, Mr. President, that I have been rather aggressive in this body during the last three or four years in opposing the majority program of direct taxes. I have labored at considerable length, although without any practical result, in opposition to the various revenue bills brought in by the majority and ultimately passed, and I have endeavored to present some of my own views and those of many of the minority regarding what should be the policy of the United States in these matters. The minority has been quite unanimously opposed, Mr. President, to the issue of any loan or any bond issue, particularly for such projects as an armor plant, a nitrate plant, a shipping board, and the several other projects for which loans are now being issued.

I do not, of course, at this time intend to enter into any discussion regarding financial policies. The majority and minority are united in a single patriotic purpose to sustain the Government and to exert the full power of the Nation in this state of war, which has been declared by Congress. Therefore the minority will support this loan bill, regardless of any individual or partisan views which may be entertained by them.

It is well known, Mr. President, that I have not been in political sympathy with the President of the United States in his international policies in connection with Mexico and during the last two or three years in other directions, and yet all those differences are laid aside by me, and I intend by my vote and voice in every way to support the Government and do what I can to bring this war to a successful conclusion.

This loan bill, Mr. President, is only part of the general fiscal program which will come before the Congress. It will be followed in a few days by an equally important bill providing for direct taxes to meet a part of the current expenses required in this emergency. The loan authorized in this bill, in my opinion, is not a large one when we consider the resources of the country, nor is it large when we come to sift the general character of it. Three billion dollars of it goes to the allies, or so much thereof as may be required; so that practically only $2,000,000,000 of permanent loan is being incurred for actual expenditures. Another $2,000,000,000 in the form of certificates of indebtedness to anticipate the taxes already provided for is authorized.

Mr. President, if we get the American Nation upon an adequate basis of preparedness by this expenditure of $2,000,000,000, I think we will be amply compensated for the expense incurred, and it will be a happy outcome of this whole discussion if by the end of two or three years, with the money herein authorized and hereafter to be provided, we shall have an Army and Navy worthy of the greatness and the power of the country and able to defend the American Republic from attacks from every quarter of the world. I repeat, Mr. President, that the loan is not large in proportion to the enormous wealth of the country.

How much of these current expenses ought to be met out of loans and how much out of taxes will have to be considered when the revenue bill comes to the Senate. I understand the English Government is now paying some 25 per cent of annual expenditures from annual taxation. During the Civil War, my recollection is, about 33 per cent of the annual expenses was paid from taxes and the rest from bond issues.

The Secretary of the Treasury has communicated to the committees of both Houses a statement of sources of revenue which would aggregate some $1,800,000,000 in round figures. If they should all be embodied in the tax law that amount of revenue of course would be raised annually. If it shall be deemed wiser in the next 10 days to raise a much smaller amount from direct taxes, 25 per cent or 50 per cent, whichever might be considered proper for the present generation to raise, it could be provided for from among those subjects of taxation and a further loan of, say, $500,000,000, more or less, could be provided for in the coming revenue bill to defray the balance of the estimated expenditures for the ensuing fiscal year, so that the real subject will come up when the question of direct taxes is before the Senate.

I think, Mr. President, it is desirable for me to call the attention of the Senate, and of the country, and to embody in my brief statement the fact that this bill also authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the remaining bonds still available to be issued under the Panama Canal bond provision of section 39 of the revenue act of August 5, 1909; the bonds authorized for the construction of the nitrate plant in section 124 of the national-defense act of June 3, 1916; the bonds authorized under section 13 of the shipping act of September 7, 1916; the bonds authorized under section 400 of the revenue act of March 3, 1917; and those authorized under public resolution of March 4, 1917, bearing interest at not to exceed 3½ per cent per annum and subject to the conversion privilege should a subsequent series of bonds be issued prior to December 31, 1918, carrying a higher rate of interest.

This paragraph, Mr. President, was desirable because the Secretary of the Treasury at the present time has authority to issue $472,000,000 worth of bonds. Two hundred and twenty-two million dollars are still available to be issued under the Panama Canal bond provision of the revenue act of August 5, 1909. The revenue act of March 3, 1917, authorizes the issuance of $100,000,000; the public resolution of March 4, 1917, authorizes the issue of $150,000,000; and the national-defense act authorizes the issue of Panama Canal bonds for the construction of a nitrate plant. The shipping act likewise authorizes the issue of Panama Canal bonds for the purpose of that act.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. Would the Senator object to including in his remarks the different projects covered by section 4—the nitrate plant, the armor plant, and so on?

Mr. PENROSE. I am glad to have the Senator from Kansas call attention to these projects.

Mr. CURTIS. These appropriations, as I understand, include $20,000,000 for the nitrate plant, $50,000,000 for the Shipping Board, $11,000,000 for the armor-plate factory, $3,000,000 for the Alaskan Railroad, $25,000,000 for the Danish West Indies, and the expenditures in connection with the Mexican situation; all, I understand, are included in section 4, and the amount covered by section 4 is about $472,000,000.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; they are in the acts enumerated. When these projects were authorized it was expected that nearly all of them would be provided for out of current revenues. Now, in the general authorization of loans for the war advantage is taken of the general situation to cover them in and relieve the current revenues from the burden of many ill-advised, unnecessary, and extravagant projects, and the many millions wasted in the Mexican situation.

Mr. President, I have reserved the right to vote for amendments to this bill, and amendments will be offered. In my opinion, at least one amendment will be offered from the minority side which is highly desirable, and should be adopted. After these amendments have been offered and considered, I have no doubt that a vote on the bill will be reached soon, and I hope it will be passed to-day.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I am very much impressed with the statement of the chairman of the Finance Committee that the time for discussion has passed. I crave only a few moments of the time of the Senate upon this important bill to state the conclusions which impel me to vote for its adoption.

I voted for the resolution declaring a state of war and authorizing its prosecution. I said nothing upon that resolution. I did not vote for it lightly, however, but after the most careful consideration. For those who differed with me I make no charge of disloyalty. It was a grave question, on which the American people might differ. But I am ready, now and at any time, to assume my share of the responsibility for that vote, or to leave it to the judgment of history.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to go over those questions and events, fresh in the mind of every American citizen and of the world, which impelled me to cast my vote to plunge this country into war; but in passing I wish to say that I believe we had the most justifiable grounds. I shall not stop to discuss them. Our treaties, which had been in existence for more than 100 years, had been ruthlessly violated; the pathways of the ocean had been closed to our commerce and to the commerce of neutral nations; our ships had been destroyed. But if our injuries had been confined to that, and even confined to the plotting of diplomatic agents and hired spies in this country or to inciting to war our neighbors with whom we are at peace, I might have said that we could wait until after this great conflict had passed and settle the damages with Germany. But, Mr. President, Germany made war upon American territory, American ships, and ruthlessly, by order of her Government, destroyed American lives; and we can not barter American lives for German gold or hawk American honor in the mailed markets of Europe. There is a price which a nation may be called on to pay for peace which no nation can afford to pay, and I believed we had reached the time when we had to call a halt, and, in the interest of humanity—and it is not the first time—engage in this conflict in Europe.

But, Mr. President, I have said more upon this subject—these being the grounds for the vote I cast—than I had intended. We have declared war. We have joined our forces in the greatest conflict of history, and I wish to raise my voice in warning that the war has not ended by its declaration. I do not share the opinion that the central empires to-day—the greatest military power the world has ever seen—are exhausted. Their territory is still intact. Remember, they have financed the war by borrowing the money from their own people, economically the strongest position in which they could be placed, and paying it back again to their people for the products to carry on that conflict. Their farms and their territory have not been laid waste, and the world is yet confronted with the greatest military power that time, national efficiency, and absolute power can produce.

To the east is Russia; and while I do not wish to discuss before the Senate anything which would be indelicate in our relations with foreign countries, I believe that the only hope of Russia in this war is the great heart of democracy. We must remember that no perfect democracy springs in a day from absolute imperial power. We must remember that on one side they are beset with plotting royalists and on the other by the discontented anarchists and socialists. I believe there would have been no hope for that nation carrying on to a successful issue the great war had it not been for the fact that the democratic principle came to the surface at the right time. But the Russian Army to-day, if I am correctly informed, is weaker than any day since the beginning of the war; and we must remember that France, upon the west, has been straining every nerve and employing every man and using all her resources to carry on this mighty conflict. How long she can carry it on, I do not know.

As I say, I am going to vote for this bill. We are at war. After two years and a half of discussion, the greatest legislative body of the Nation has deliberately adopted the resolution and we have crossed that bridge. I believe that we should carry on that war with all our resources, with all our power, and do it in a way that will be most effective.

I am not disturbed, Mr. President, with the feeling that we are departing from American traditions by engaging in an alliance with European nations. If we are to make war upon European nations, we can only do it in concert with those who are now carrying on the war. We can not reach German territory, and Germany can not reach ours, except upon the high seas. We can not enter independently and separately and by ourselves, a war which has been waged in the interest of humanity and the world's democracy for two and a half years. We can not successfully carry on such a war without allies.

Nor am I disturbed by what I have heard many times since this question became imminent—that by joining this war we are going to involve ourselves in the entanglements which must necessarily come in European politics when the conflict shall cease. By joining a war to defeat Germany, we are not going to say what indemnity Belgium shall demand, or whether France shall make peace with or without Alsace-Lorraine; nor are we going to decide whether there shall be an independent Poland. I believe the President did at one time say something about "peace without victory," and an independent Poland; but I take it, Mr. President, from his last address delivered to this Congress, in the face of impending war, that the President has changed his mind. Nor are we going to say whether Italy shall receive back the Trentino, or are we going to engage in the politics of the Balkan Peninsula, or insist that Russia shall realize her dream of the Golden Horn. Those are questions with which we do not concern ourselves by engaging in the war against what we call a great military autocracy.

As I said before, I had hoped for months and months that some way might be found whereby American rights might be protected, and American honor sustained, and American citizens' lives protected, without resorting to the arbitrament of war, but I came reluctantly to the conclusion that that could not be, and that there would be no peace in the world or security for this Nation until that Prussian dynasty, not a democracy, was forever driven from power.

I was in Europe when the war broke out, and I have a more or less intimate acquaintance in the German Empire and in the countries now at war with her. I found among the people of Germany and the people of France no hatred for each other, and they could not understand why they were to be plunged into the horrors of a war. I believe I understand it. I believe there is involved in this war something more than the expansion of trade, the ambition of empire, or the lust of conquest. I believe it to be the old, old struggle—as old as civilization itself—between absolute autocratic power and the growth of democracy.

Mr. President, this, of course, as everyone knows, is a most remarkable period of world history. The close of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth centuries was also a remarkable period. It witnessed, for the first time in centuries, the establishment and the growth of democracy. It saw the light of a new Republic raised in the western skies; and the French Revolution and the great Napoleonic wars which followed it were the beginning of the end of absolute monarchy and absolute power. The lapse of 100 years has seen tremendous progress in the development of government. It has seen the greatest part of the civilized world at last joined by Imperial Russia. It has witnessed a development of a large degree of self-government among the leading nations of the world, where the people have a voice in their affairs. But there is one autocracy—and I do not say one unkind word for the great, progressive, wonderful German people—there is one autocracy or one military power which has not yet felt the march of progress, and that is the German Empire. There has not been a change of parties in that Empire since the days of Bismarck.

Mr. President, I am going to support this bill. I am going to support the legislation necessary to place the power in this Government to take part in a war which I had hoped and prayed might never come. But I do so with the realization that this colossal loan and these taxes may be but a beginning, and that the American people may hereafter be called upon to make sacrifices that they have not yet dreamed of.

I believe, however, that in the progress of the world if we expect in this land to enjoy the blessings of liberty, we must be true to those ideals on which that liberty is founded, and that in the interests of our institutions and freedom of our great democracy we are called upon to-day to make that sacrifice. I believe the time has come when we must respond.

I thank the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I approve the expressed desire of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to conclude the consideration of this bill to-day. I wish to aid him in reaching that result. I would not take the time of the Senate for a moment, except that I feel constrained in justice to myself to state my attitude.

We are dealing with a great subject of present moment, but a subject which has a far-reaching future significance. Because of its future significance I feel I should say what I have in mind to say. This may not be, probably will not be, of special interest to Senators who hear me, but it is of great interest to me and to mine. I do not expect to take more than 30 minutes of the time of the Senate to say what I have in mind to say, and I hope I may say that without interruption, and this for the reason that I fear interruptions might lead me far afield in discussion, and thus possibly subject me to the criticism of having unduly consumed the time of the Senate. I have been heretofore subjected to that kind of criticism, although unjustified.

Mr. President, the bond issues authorized by the pending bill are divided into two classes—bonds for the benefit of our allies, and bonds for our own uses. I speak, first, of that provision of the bill which authorizes the issue of $3,000,000,000 of bonds to be used in establishing credits for our war allies in Europe. In effect these $3,000,000,000 bonds, or their proceeds, are to be in the nature of a loan to our European allies; but the loan is to be secured by the bonds of the borrowers, respectively; that is, each Government borrowing will issue its own bonds in an amount equal to its loan to be held by the United States as security in each case. This $3,000,000,000 issue, therefore, will be so secured as to take care of itself, without imposing a substantial burden on the American Government or people, provided we lose nothing on the bonds we receive.

As a general proposition I approve and support the purposes for which this particular bond issue is made. I approve it as a war measure—not otherwise. I say it will not ultimately be a burden on the American people, provided the Governments to which loans shall be made will be able to take care of their exchange bonds delivered to us. Having cast our fortunes with the allies, we must work with them and aid them. In aiding them to more effectively prosecute the war, no doubt at the same time we aid ourselves. Nevertheless, I would not be understood as saying that in extending these credits to our allies we are not rendering them a very important and valuable service. I think the service we thus render is both very important and very valuable. That is all I care to say at this time about this particular bond issue.

AS TO THE OTHER BONDS.

I wish now to speak very briefly about the $2,000,000,000 of bonds and the $2,000,000,000 of certificates of indebtedness authorized to be issued by the bill, not for the use of foreign Governments, but for the use of our own Government in prosecuting such activities as this Government may undertake upon its own account as a participant in the war. It is proposed by the bill to raise $4,000,000,000 for the use of this Government for the purposes stated. According to the program outlined by the bill it is proposed to divide this sum of $4,000,000,000 so as to halve it between bonds and taxes. In other words, it is proposed to issue $2,000,000,000 of 3½ per cent bonds to run for such a term of years as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and in addition thereto to issue $2,000,000,000 of certificates of indebtedness bearing the same rate of interest, and be made payable within one year from the date of issue. These certificates of indebtedness are to be issued in anticipation of taxes to be levied and raised to pay them off as they mature. To accomplish that it will be necessary to increase taxation upon a large number of articles. It may be stated that these certificates of indebtedness are really tax certificates to be paid out of the current revenues of the Government. As I have said, both these bonds and certificates are to bear interest at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum, and both are also to be made exempt from all forms of taxation—Federal, State, and municipal.

Mr. President, at this point I desire to read an editorial article clipped from the Wall Street Journal of April 13, four days ago. It is as follows:

WE CAN NOT AFFORD FAILURE.

It is imperative that the first war loan of the United States shall be a success from the moment it is issued. We can not afford failure. When we enter the war for democracy as the richest Nation in the world, we can not afford to be laughed at for our inability to handle our mobile wealth in war. It is not the bankers, but the people that absorb Government issues. The bankers are merely the distributing middlemen.

With the serious consequences of a failure in view, Congress should see to it that no restriction is placed upon Secretary McAdoo as to the rate of interest. Congress is in no position to say that there is any such terrific sum as $5,000,000,000 waiting for prompt investment at 3½ per cent, and only requiring to be withdrawn from the savings banks and other depositories. Hundreds of thousands of depositors may never hear of the loan at all, or hear of it too late.

We are giving Mr. McAdoo full discretion in all details of the loan other than interest. But it is that detail which is more important than all the others, and that the loan shall be attractive is essential to any success. That success will go a long way to hearten the democracies of the world, but nothing could encourage Germany or discourage our allies more than to have our first war loan lamentably undersubscribed. There must be a premium from the start.

Congress sometimes forgets that while Government can commandeer inheritances, incomes, business, and property, as well as the lives and services of the citizens, it can not commandeer public subscription. It can only invite such subscription, and, therefore, the form and terms of the invitation are of the most far-reaching importance. A poor reception of the loan might have the gravest consequences in promoting home disorder by showing weakness to the enemy within, as well as to the enemy without.

We can not afford failure.

Here is a covert plea for a higher rate of interest on the bonds. I have read this for two reasons; first, to exhibit it as a fine example of Wall Street patriotism, if I may be permitted to say this without subjecting myself to an indictment for treason; and, secondly, to make a remark or two with especial relation to one clause in the article quoted. That clause I will reread:

Congress sometimes forgets that while Government can commandeer inheritances, incomes, business, and property, as well as the lives and services of the citizens, it can not commandeer public subscription.

That is true; but as this article itself admits, there are things that Congress can "commandeer." The Congress can, through the taxing power, "commandeer" any per cent of the surplus wealth of the country deemed necessary to meet the financial needs of the Government. That we can commandeer.

Mr. President, I beg leave further to say that if I could have my way—which, of course, I can not—I would hesitate to authorize the issuance of the $2,000,000,000 bonds about which I am now speaking, and I certainly would not issue more than half that amount.

If I could have my way—now, let me stop right here to interject. Senators, what are we here considering at this time? We are embarked upon a great war. The honor of the Nation is at stake; yes, the honor and the resources of the Nation are pledged to the due prosecution of this war. Every Senator and every true American must help keep that pledge to the letter. Any man who does not feel and act that way commits an offense even morally, if not technically, worse than treason, for he brands himself with the stamp of disloyalty to his Nation. But in the prosecution of a great war it is certainly within the province of the Congress which declares the war, and without whose authority there can be no legal status of war, to determine the best means of prosecuting the war and the best means of producing the necessary revenue to support the Government in its time of stress. Can not we say what we think? Should we not do so? I think and feel—I can not be convinced otherwise—that it is the legitimate function of the Congress that each Senator and Representative should express his own opinion, if, indeed, he has an opinion of his own. Do you not think so? Anyhow, I do, and, so help me God, I will stand by that position at all hazards.

If I could have my way, I would at least cut this two-billion-dollar issue half in two, so that the bond issue would be reduced to $1,000,000,000, and transfer the other billion provided for and merge it into certificates of indebtedness, so as to make the issue of certificates $3,000,000,000 instead of $2,000,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENDRICK in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. STONE. If the Senator really desires to interrupt me——

Mr. BORAH. I believe the Senator did suggest that he did not want to be interrupted.

Mr. STONE. Whenever the Senator from Idaho asks me to yield I can not resist him.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the position of the Senator—and that is the only question I desire to ask—does the Senator think that the present generation should, through taxation, take care of more than——

Mr. STONE. I am going to discuss that.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator is going to discuss it, but the idea of the Senator in changing it from bonds to certificates is on the theory of having this generation take care of that much more of the indebtedness.

Mr. STONE. The Senator has my idea.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to say also that I am in full sympathy with the Senator's view.

Mr. STONE. I am glad to know that, and I am not at all surprised.

The effect of that—that is to say, that you may catch the connection—the effect of cutting the two-billion-dollar bonds to one billion and increasing the two-billion certificates of indebtedness to three billion would be to increase by one-third the amount to be paid practically during the war out of the current revenue collections. I would do that, Mr. President, because, according to my view of what is best promotive of the public good, it is wiser to pay as we go in great national emergencies. In the long run I think that plan would be infinitely better and cheaper. In the end I believe the Nation would be far better off if the burden of carrying on war or of meeting any other form of emergency requiring great expenditures, if the requirements of the Government should be met by taxes levied on the wealth of the country and widely distributed over substantially the whole field of our industrial life instead of transmitting the burden to future generations as a mortgage on the industrial and laboring interests of those who are to succeed us and who have no voice in what we do to-day.

As individuals we are careful to guard the estates we leave to our children against burdens which impair their value and which may embarrass those to whom we affectionately transmit what we have accumulated for their future welfare. Why should not the same principle apply when, as a nation made up of fathers and mothers, we come to deal with public affairs; and particularly when, as in the case now immediately before us, we come to deal with a subject wherein we have the choice of determining whether we will ourselves bear the burden of our own course of public conduct or transmit the burden to our children?

I know that this view is the absolute converse of the view which has been expressed in our hearing by other Senators. I have no desire to absorb the time of the Senate in a useless, unavailing discussion of this subject. Nevertheless, I feel unwilling to allow the bill to go to a vote without expressing my conviction that the bill would have been more wisely constructed if it had been framed on the lines I have suggested. The lines I have suggested are those I understood the President to substantially commit himself in his address to the joint session of the Congress on the second day of this month. Let me read what he said. In telling the Congress what they would be obliged to meet in the grave exigencies confronting the country, among other things, he said:

> It will involve also, of course, the granting of adequate credits to the Government sustained, I hope, so far as they can equitably be sustained by the present generation, by well-conceived taxation.

I think I am following the President's thought in what I have been saying, not only in what I have quoted but in other recommendations he has made to Congress when tax questions were before us. I think I am in accord with the views the President has expressed more than once in this behalf.

Here I wish to have read an excerpt from the "Principles of Political Economy," by John Stuart Mill, and also a comment on the text covered by this quotation from the pen of Prof. J. Lawrence Laughlin, one of the greatest students and most authoritative writers on economic questions in America.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From John Stuart Mill.]

"This leads to the vexed question to which Dr. Chalmers has very particularly adverted: Whether the funds required by a government for extraordinary unproductive expenditure are best raised by loans, the interest only being provided by taxes, or whether taxes should be at once laid onto the whole amount, which is called, in the financial vocabulary, raising the whole of the supplies within the year. Dr. Chalmers is strongly for the latter method. He says the common notion is that, in calling for the whole amount in one year, you require what is either impossible or very inconvenient; that the people can not, without great hardship, pay the whole at once out of their yearly income; and that it is much better to require of them a small payment every year in the shape of interest than so great a sacrifice once for all. To which his answer is that the sacrifice is made equally in either case. Whatever is spent can not but be drawn from yearly income. The whole and every part of the wealth produced in the country forms, or helps to form, the yearly income of somebody. The privation which it is supposed must result from taking the amount in the shape of taxes is not avoided by taking it in a loan. The suffering is not averted, but only thrown upon the laboring classes, the least able, and who least ought to bear it; while all the inconveniences, physical, moral, and political, produced by maintaining taxes for the perpetual payment of the interest, are incurred in pure loss. Whenever capital is withdrawn from production or from the fund destined for production, to be lent to the State and expended unproductively, that whole sum is withheld from the laboring classes; the loan, therefore, is in truth paid off the same year; the whole of the sacrifice necessary for paying it off is actually made, only it is paid to the wrong persons and therefore does not extinguish the claim, and paid by the very worst of taxes, a tax exclusively on the laboring class. And, after having in this most painful and unjust of ways gone through the whole effort necessary for extinguishing the debt, the country remains charged with it and with the payment of its interest in perpetuity." (Chap. 4, pp. 85–87.)

[Prof. Laughlin's Comments.]

"The United States, for example, borrows capital from A, with which it buys stores from B. If the loan all comes from within the country, A's capital is borrowed, when the United States should have taken that amount outright by taxation. When the money is borrowed of A, the laborers undergo the sacrifice, the title to the whole sum remains in A's hands, and the claim against the Government by A still exists, while, if the amount were taken by taxation, the title to the sum raised is in the State, and it is paid to the right person.

"The experience of the United States during the Civil War is an illustration of this principle. It is asserted that, as a matter of fact, the total expenses of the war were defrayed by the Northern States, during the four years of its continuance, out of surplus earnings; and yet at the close of the conflict a debt of $2,800,000,000 was saddled on the country.

The United States borrowed	$2,400,000,000
Revenue during that time	1,700,000,000
Total cost of the war	4,100,000,000

"In reality we borrowed only about $1,500,000,000, instead of $2,400,000,000, since (1) the Government issued paper which depreciated and yet received it at par in subscriptions for loans. Moreover, the total cost would have been much reduced had we issued no paper and (2) thereby not increased the prices of goods to the State, and (3) if no interest account had been created by borrowing. But could the country have raised the whole sum each year by taxation? In the first fiscal year after the war the United States paid in war taxes $650,000,000. At the beginning of the struggle, to June 30, 1862, the expenditure was $515,000,000 and by June 30, 1863, it had amounted to $1,098,000,000, so that $600,000,000 of taxes a year would have paid the war expenses and left us free of debt at the close.

"A confirmatory experience is that of England during the continental wars, 1793–1817:

Total war expenditures	£1,060,000,000
Interest charge on the existing debt	235,000,000
Total amount required	1,295,000,000
Revenue for that period	1,145,000,000
Deficit	150,000,000

"To provide for this deficit the Government actually increased its debt by £600,000,000. A slight additional exertion would have provided £150,000,000 more of revenue and saved £450,000,000 to the taxpayers." (Same reference.)

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, as I see it, the views of the President, of Mr. Mill, and of Prof. Laughlin are substantially in accord, and it is needless to say that I am in accord with them.

A word more and I am through. It is contrary to all my teaching and it is impossible for me to believe that a great interest-bearing, nontaxable public indebtedness, represented in the form of bonds, is a public blessing; I regard it as quite the contrary. Here we propose to concentrate and lock up two thousand million dollars of the Nation's surplus wealth in just such bonds. The men of great wealth will naturally seek and accept investment in these bonds, particularly so when the promise is held out to them of a higher future rate of interest. That means that this vast aggregate of wealth will be withdrawn from active business and from all obligation to participate in the support and maintenance of the Government, whether National, State, or municipal. The bonds are not taxable.

But, Mr. President, this bill has been passed by a unanimous vote in the House of Representatives, and it has been reported by a substantially unanimous vote of the Senate Committee on Finance, for I did not vote against favorably reporting it. I think it would not be improper for me to say, however, that I laid before the committee substantially and in effect the views I am now expressing; but there was no favorable response from the membership of that body, and I do not think there will be any different response from the membership of this body. It is the war measure presented by the House of Representatives, and I think it has the approval of the Senate. Therefore I shall accept the judgment of the Congress and vote for the bill, because it is a war measure and is deemed to be a measure essential to the successful prosecution of the war upon which we have entered. Nevertheless, I feel it due to myself to say that I believe every purpose sought by our Government, and every need of our Government in prosecuting that purpose, could be as well accomplished along the lines I suggest, and accomplished with far better results to the general interests and welfare of the Government and the people. I know I am powerless to impress my view on the Senate as things now are, but I wish this view of mine to stand in the RECORD for my own sake as a testimony when I am gone.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I offered an amendment this morning to the pending bill, which I now ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator that the amendment has temporarily been taken from the desk, but will be returned in a moment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the amendment is not on the Secretary's desk for any reason, I will read from the bill itself in such wise as to inform the Senators present what its object and extent are. It is offered to section 6, which is the section providing for an issue, in addition to the bonds authorized by the other sections of the bill, of $2,000,000,000 of what are called certificates of indebtedness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Secretary now has the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Secretary now has the amendment, I prefer that he should read it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Colorado whether or not the proposed amendment has been printed

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; it was offered this morning.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to address an inquiry to the Senator from Colorado. Has this amendment been submitted or referred in any way to the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. THOMAS. It has not.

Mr. PENROSE. Nor to the committee, either?

Mr. THOMAS. Nor to the committee, either. I want to say something about that later on.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, my attention was diverted for a moment. Will the Senator please state again the general purpose of the amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. The Secretary now has it, and I have just asked him to read it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

On page 6, section 6, lines 18 and 19, strike out the words "to borrow from time to time on the credit of the United States";

On line 20, same page, strike out the words "such sum or sums as";

On page 6, line 21, strike out the words "in his judgment may be necessary and"; also the word "therefor" in the same line; strike out all of lines 23 and 24, page 6, together with the word "annum" on line 25;

On line 26, page 6, strike out the words "with the interest accrued thereon";

On line 3, page 7, strike out the word "not";

So that section 6, as proposed to be amended, will read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That in addition to the bonds authorized by sections 1 and 4 of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, for the purposes of this act and to meet public expenditures authorized by law, to issue certificates of indebtedness at not less than par in such form as he may prescribe; and each certificate so issued shall be payable at such time, not exceeding one year from the date of its issue as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Certificates of indebtedness herein authorized shall bear the circulation privilege, and the sum of such certificates outstanding shall at no time exceed in the aggregate $2,000,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, before speaking to this amendment a word of explanation is necessary. I had an engagement yesterday of an important character which took me away from Washington. I was consequently unable to attend the meeting of the Committee on Finance, of which I am a member. Had the situation been otherwise, I should have brought this amendment to the attention of the committee, where it properly belonged. If I had been present, I think I should say that I should have voted favorably to report it to the Senate for immediate consideration, and I shall not very long postpone a vote upon it. So much by way of preliminary.

Mr. President, I have no expectation that the amendment which I offer will receive more than the passing consideration of a small minority of the Senate. Indeed, it is somewhat embarrassing on an occasion like this to present amendments or to indulge in extended criticism of the measure itself without incurring in some quarters the suspicion of opposing the principal measure and of being an obstacle to the vigorous prosecution of the common purpose of the Nation. Indeed, it was suggested to me by one Member of this body a day or two ago that it was our bounden duty to accept without question and to adopt without hesitation all measures deemed by the departments to be essential to a successful prosecution of the war. I regret to say, Mr. President, that that view is not wholly confined to the Congress, but finds expression all over the country, although to adopt it would be to abdicate our legislative functions. For my part, I shall support the administration heartily and constantly, as I have supported it before this terrible crisis was upon us, and with greater zeal, because now we have but one object and one purpose, and that is the successful prosecution of a most serious and perhaps a protracted conflict. But, Mr. President, with regard to details, and particularly those affecting questions of revenue, Senators would be remiss in their duty, not only to themselves but to their constituencies, did they not as we go along emphasize some of the plans which may be proposed and may be accepted as desirable, although falling for the time upon unwilling and reluctant ears.

Indeed, the President only on yesterday published a statement to the country, the dominant note of which was cooperation and economy. It was a most timely and important state paper, one which the conditions and requirements of the time insistently demanded, and one which, I am sure, will be gratefully received and acted upon by all classes and conditions of men. It was addressed to us, as citizens of a common country, quite as much as to those whom we represent here, and was perhaps as much needed in the Halls of Congress as throughout the different communities of the Republic. It is in accordance with that spirit of cooperation and economy, which should be practiced now as never before, that I venture to offer this amendment and to submit some reasons for it.

I believe, Mr. President, that if it should be adopted it would save this Nation in the matter of taxes alone for the year immediately before us the sum of not to exceed $70,000,000, a sum of money which is of no comparative consequence in these times when we speak as freely and as nonchalantly of billions as did the celebrated Mr. Sellers in "The Mighty Dollar," which some time ago diverted the theatrical world, but $70,000,000 nevertheless is of sufficient magnitude to justify reference to it for a passing moment.

Two thousand millions of dollars, Mr. President, is a sum representing $20 per capita to this Nation of 100,000,000 people, and the interest upon it at 3½ per cent is 70 cents per capita, which, multiplied through a period of 30 years, would exceed the principal. The annual interest upon the proposed issue of five thousand millions will be $175,000,000 per annum, and that, too, in 30 years will exceed the principal, leaving that principal still to be paid, if it is ever paid, by other generations. So that the little item of seventy millions at this time, as I have said, worthy at least of a moment's consideration.

The amendment which I propose in substance is to strike out the interest-bearing provision of section 6, so that the certificates of indebtedness issued by the Government in anticipation of its revenues and to meet current obligations will be taken by the creditor at their face. We have been told, and it is true, that our credit never was as great as it is at present. We have with perfect truth congratulated ourselves that our vast resources, the aggregate of our national wealth, the enterprise of our people, the initiative which our institutions not only permit but encourage, and the manner in which we have met our obligations in the past all combine to make our credit gilt-edged and everlasting. If that be so, then why should not the Government of the United States, for the purpose of meeting its immediate obligations, mobilize that credit, as everything else now is about to be mobilized, in the national interest? Why should Uncle Sam be required to stand like a common pleader for money at the threshold of the money lenders, hat in hand, asking for the extension of temporary credit, with interest at 3½ per cent per annum, when, under the laws and Constitution, sanctioned and recognized by a long line of thoughtful decisions of the Supreme Court, it can lawfully exercise the power to issue these certificates for exchange at their face value for all our obligations?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if it does not interrupt the Senator's statement, will he permit an inquiry?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. Why might not the Government just as well issue greenbacks at once to the extent of $2,000,000,000? Why go through the formality of issuing certificates of indebtedness and then issuing the currency on them?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, paraphrasing my friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], I will reply by saying that if I had my way—which I have not—that would be precisely what this Government would do. I believe, Mr. President—I am morally certain—that if this war is prosecuted and lasts for a year and a half, that is precisely what we will do, as we did in the throes of the great Civil War, and in the doing of which this Nation was saved and the Republic of our fathers perpetuated.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator's answer has been very direct and to the point, and was what I suspected would be his reply. Why does he, then, in this amendment resort to what would seem to be a subterfuge? Why does he not make his amendment direct and to the point and provide for the issue of greenbacks to any amount necessary?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator may be able to discover a subterfuge in the proposed amendment——

Mr. PENROSE. I will say that with all due respect to the Senator's amendment, which I know is offered in good faith.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand, of course; I acquit the Senator of all reflections. I know that what he says is said in perfect good faith and without any disrespect. I want to say, however, that if there is a subterfuge in it I am too mentally obtuse to perceive it. But, Mr. President, I am endeavoring to meet such objections as I know would be presented to an amendment designed for an issue immediately of what are called "greenbacks" by taking this proposal and molding it in that direction, while at the same time robbing it of those features which to a great many men seem to be very dangerous because of the inflation which would necessarily follow.

What is this amendment? It is that the Secretary of the Treasury may issue the identical certificates provided for in the bill as reported from the committee, but when issued they shall bear no interest. They are redeemable within a year, or, to put it differently, they are to be paid by or before the end of a year, and they are given, under the proposed amendment, the circulation privilege. If a subterfuge exists in this method of legislation, it must be in the fact that the words "certificates of indebtedness" are used in place of the words "Treasury note" and in the fact that there is a limitation of 12 months upon the life of the proposed certificates, whereas the Treasury note is payable at the pleasure of the Government.

To those who fear inflation let me say that I share the apprehension entertained by a great many with regard to the evils of inflation. I believe that the two thousand millions of dollars to be borrowed by the Government at 3½ per cent under the issuance of these certificates of indebtedness, passing at once into the channels of trade and circulation, will to that extent inflate the currency and bring about the evils which are feared because of too widely extended circulation. It is not so much the amount of money within the borders of the Nation as it is the proportion of that money in active circulation which causes inflation.

Mr. President, under the proposed amendment, the Secretary of the Treasury is given authority and full discretion to issue these certificates in such wise and in such amounts as he may prescribe; and I take it that inasmuch as he is among those who are opposed to the issuance of promises to pay to circulate as money, he will see to it that their denominations are sufficiently great to make their general circulation an impossibility. Here is another provision or condition which, if subterfuge exists, must constitute it, since it is an added obstacle to this increase of circulation by flushing the channels of trade and commerce with two thousand millions of small-sized currency.

Mr. President, let me ask if we can save this $70,000,000 by authorizing the Government to utilize its first-class credit, not by borrowing money, but by issuing its certificates of indebtedness directly to those who have claims against the Government, is it not worth while to do so? You can not escape inflation, Senators. You can not possibly avoid its consequences by giving names or changing names in their application to certain things. If you issue five thousand millions of bonds, as you are going to do, you will inflate the currency. Of course the amount comprised in that figure is greater than all the money in the United States, but every actual dollar, of course, means several dollars of credit. The intrusion into this country of the vast business requirements and demands of the allies since the beginning of this war, independently of the amount of gold that has come here, has inflated our currency, and accounts in very large degree for the enormous rise in prices. The mobilization of the money of the country during the Civil War, before the greenbacks were issued, inflated the currency and, to the extent of its inflation, was reflected in the prices of all the commodities manufactured and traded in by the people.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The statement that the Senator has just made, that the issuing of the five billions of bonds would inflate the currency of our country, I think would be well within the truth if the bonds were to be sold to foreign countries and money were to come into this country in lieu of the bonds. But, if the bonds are to be sold in the United States, purchased by the people of the United States and the money of the United States, then does not the Senator believe that it will not inflate the currency?

Mr. THOMAS. I think it will inflate the currency in the sense in which that term is generally used; and I think that the experiences of Germany, whose bonds have been sold in just the way that the Senator suggests we are going to sell ours, should substantiate the proposition, because there prices have risen very largely. There, first, the purchase of the bonds and afterwards the use of the proceeds by the Government have unquestionably increased the proportion of money in the country which is in active circulation.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but the Senator must understand that our bonds are not going to be upon the same basis as the bonds of Germany for this reason: Germany's bonds to-day are virtually upon a paper basis; the whole country is on a paper basis; whereas every bond that we issue must be upon a gold basis, just as every obligation that the Government of the United States has to-day is on that basis. So between the two countries the comparison, I think, is unfortunate.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the bonds issued by Germany are upon a gold basis. They were bought with a paper circulation, just as the bonds issued by the Government of the United States during the Civil War were upon a gold basis, or rather upon a coin basis, and bought with a depreciated paper circulation. The thousands upon thousands of millions of securities issued by the governments at war, plus the bonds which we are going to issue now, together with those that we will probably have to issue hereafter, are all based upon the gold supply of the world, and the fact that immediately they are paid in paper does not in any sense change that proposition; and the few thousand millions of gold belonging to the people of the world is the basis of that inverted pyramid which, constantly increasing, will make it more and more difficult for the generations which are to bear this burden to meet their annual interest payments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. What the Senator says would be true providing we were going to allow our currency to take the same course as that which has been taken in Germany; but every dollar of currency that we have issued in the United States has back of it a certain percentage of gold, and under our laws it is impossible for us to issue currency without that gold back of the currency issued, whereas the paper money that has been issued in Germany has nothing back of it to-day except the credit of the nation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator how much gold we have in active circulation in this country, supposedly?

Mr. SMOOT. About $3,000,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. We are issuing $5,000,000,000 worth of bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, I mean the Government of the United States has that much. Of course, I can not say how much there may be in the pockets of the people. The Senator is perfectly correct in saying that the $5,000,000,000 is more in amount than the gold of this country; but we have back of every one of our dollars of currency issued, as provided by law, a certain percentage of gold to secure the payment of it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, of course we are all familiar with the fact that until we abandon specie payments we are upon a gold basis. Neither, however, is there any disputing the fact that if we continue issuing bonds upon a gold basis for the purpose of securing funds with which to carry on a world-wide war, with each bond issue that basis becomes the more and the more precarious. It affects not only the bonds themselves but every dollar of circulation in the country, and, as was suggested by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] a moment ago, this bond issue is itself far in excess of the total supply of gold in the United States—that in circulation and that which is not in circulation, but the basis of our gold certificates.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but the security back of the United States bonds, although they are made payable in gold, is the property of the United States, all of it, and irrespective of what it may be.

Mr. THOMAS. I know that, of course. Now the Senator is stating something that is a good deal more substantial in support of his position, when he says that in addition to the gold of the country our bonds have back of them every dollar of the wealth of the country owned in private hands, which is merely saying that we are issuing them upon our credit; that is all. Inasmuch as we are issuing them upon our credit, why not issue these certificates which we are going to take up within a year without paying the money changers of the country $70,000,000 for them? That is my proposition in a nutshell.

I very much fear, Mr. President, that the present will not be the last measure considered, even by this Congress, and providing for a bond issue. I am very much afraid that possibly before the snows of November shall fly, probably before the spring of 1918 shall come, we will be assembled here for another issue of bonds, the equivalent of or superior in amount to the issue which we are now contemplating. It must be remembered that the bonds issued by governments in modern times are not designed to be paid. In theory they may be, but in practice they are not designed to be paid, for the British people are paying interest to-day upon the debt which was contracted in the American War of the Revolution. They are issued, I will not say entirely, but largely, for the purpose of placing our own obligations and liabilities upon the shoulders of unborn generations—a practice which, in my judgment, should not be resorted to except in the direst national necessity; a practice which will result in the bankruptcy of every nation on the European Continent engaged in this war; a practice which will either result in their bankruptcy or in revolutions which will bring about its equivalent. I believe that in a crisis of this sort, as far as possible through a system of direct taxation we should meet our expenses as we are confronted with them, placing as little as possible of the burden upon our children and upon our children's children.

Mr. President, we may not all profess Christianity; but when it comes to the payment of our obligations, we all believe in the doctrine of vicarious atonement.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. There are two thoughts I have in mind that I would be glad if the Senator from Colorado or some other Senator could enlighten me about.

Under the terms of the bill we are to take the bonds of our allies in exchange for the bonds we issue to establish credits for them. Can any Senator here advise me with any degree of accurate knowledge as to the current value of the bonds of these allies which we are to take in exchange for, or in the way of collateral for, the bonds we are to issue to establish credits for them?

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator mean the market value?

Mr. STONE. The market value. I think that is what I mean.

Mr. THOMAS. I can not answer that question, but I will cheerfully yield the floor for the purpose to any Senator who can.

Mr. STONE. I have been told, but told in a way that I can not accept as absolutely reliable, that the bonds of many of these countries are very much below par.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Utah says, sotto voce, that that is true.

Mr. PENROSE. I think that is true, Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will permit me. I think I noticed that the last issue of bonds in England was at 95.

Mr. STONE. Well, I have been told that the bonds of one of the chief countries—I do not feel justified in being more particular—are current in the markets of the world at about 50 to 60 per cent of their face value.

Mr. SMOOT. That is taking into consideration the exchange as well.

Mr. STONE. Well, whatever it is, I state that. Now, that is one of the questions I have in mind. I am curious to know just how the ultimate balance will stand.

The other question I desire to ask, if the Senator will pardon and permit me, is covered by this clause in the President's address of April 2——

Mr. THOMAS. From what page does the Senator read?

Mr. STONE. I am reading from page 6. I will read, as follows:

> It is our duty, I most respectfully urge, to protect our people so far as we may against the very serious hardships and evils which would be likely to arise out of the inflation which would be produced by vast loans.

That, as I understood it, was intended as an argument by the President against borrowing too much money, and in favor of the policy which I advocate, as I suppose with his approval, of the present generation—the generation of this day and time—bearing the chief burden of this war instead of passing it on to our children.

Mr. THOMAS. Is the Senator quite sure he is reading from page 6?

Mr. STONE. I will give it to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I see that the Senator has a different print from mine. It is on page 5 of my print.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt that the bonds of all the belligerent countries are selling below par, and at the same time drawing interest, at least, of 5 per cent per annum. The object in loaning the $3,000,000,000 to the allies, as the President may see fit, is to assist the allies in securing money at a lower rate of interest than they are paying now, and also to prevent any commissions being charged the allies for the sale of the bonds. There is no question but that if England should undertake to-day to place a bond issue at the rate of interest of 3½ per cent, she would not get more than 87 to 90 cents on the dollar for the bonds. Her credit is not as good as that of the United States, and now our country is undertaking to lend to England our credit——

Mr. STONE. Which is worth 100 cents on the dollar.

Mr. SMOOT. Which is worth 100 cents on the dollar, at a rate of interest of 3½ per cent; and England, or whatever country borrows the money, will get the advantage of the credit of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). The Senator from Colorado has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield for a question.

Mr. BORAH. In this connection, may I ask something which has occurred to me heretofore several times? We are loaning this money to the allies in order to enable the allies to avoid paying commissions and high rates of interest.

Mr. SMOOT. And to assist in the continuation of the war.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; of course. Now, are we going to have any means or method by which to control the price at which we are to sell to them the munitions of war? Are we going as a Government to loan them money and then permit a few people to get it back in the way of huge profits on war materials?

Mr. SMOOT. That, of course, I can not answer. That is a matter that is in the hands of Congress. If Congress decides to give the power to this administration to fix the price at which munitions shall be sold, I think Congress has that power; but otherwise I do not believe it will be done, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Well, I think it ought to be done. I think we should fix prices for the people abroad and for our own people.

Mr. SMOOT. That is a question for Congress to decide.

Mr. BORAH. We have heard a great deal in the last few months about our gratitude to France. It would seem that our gratitude is manifested in two ways—first, by making all the money that we have been able to make by reason of large profits upon our munitions of war, and, secondly, of voting a tremendous bonded indebtedness upon our children.

Mr. SMOOT. In answer to the second question asked by the Senator from Missouri, I am not so clear as to what the President really meant in his message; but if the President had made that statement with the understanding that the bonds were to be sold outside of the United States and the obligations of the United States were to be sold to a foreign country and in payment for the bonds gold sent into this country, there is no question but what there would be an inflation of the currency in our country. I do not know yet the idea the President had in view in making the statement he did, but I am quite sure that if conditions happened as I have stated there would be an inflation of currency in this country such as we have never seen before.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I hope I will not be charged with causing unnecessary delay in the final consideration of the bill by these divergences from my main purpose. They are very interesting and very important, however, and I am not complaining.

The Senator's idea of inflation may be correct and mine may be entirely wrong, and yet I can not escape the conclusion I announced that the amount of money in circulation is the standard by which inflation is to be determined. If my credit were good enough with the Senator from Utah to enable me to borrow $10,000 from him, and after having received it I should go around and take in the city of Washington, the chances are that I would increase the circulation and possibly elevate prices to a certain degree. Certainly, I would put more money out among those perhaps who need it as well as those who do not, than if I were unable to negotiate that loan. There is no more money in the country; but there is that much more money in circulation because of our arrangement and my consequent ability and willingness to put it into circulation. I think the President had that in mind, and very correctly, when he said:

> It is our duty, I must respectfully urge, to protect our people so far as we may against the very serious hardships and evils which would be likely to arise out of the inflation which would be produced by vast loans.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, if "the Senator from Utah" had $10,000 to loan, in the first place, he would have to have that $10,000 somewhere under his control, and if he loaned the Senator from Colorado $10,000 he would have to take it from somewhere that he had it and loan it to the Senator. If the Senator from Colorado spent the $10,000 in Washington, there would be more money in Washington by $10,000, but there would be $10,000 less wherever the Senator from Utah took it from. If "the Senator from Utah" had had that $10,000 in Europe and brought the money from there to this country and loaned it to the Senator from Colorado and he spent it here in the District of Columbia, there would be ten thousand more dollars in the United States and ten thousand less in Europe.

Mr. THOMAS. There would be $10,000 less under those circumstances in the vaults of the bank where the Senator had it on deposit. Lord Bacon said a great many years ago that money was like manure, it was only good in proportion as you spread it. In the heap it is of no consequence; it might as well be nonexistent for all practical purposes. In general circulation it is a great benefit; but at the same time it tends to inflate the currency circulation. I insist we can not go into the market for one thousand million dollars or two thousand million dollars or five thousand million dollars and obtain that money for exigent purposes, for which it must be used in circulation, without producing those evils of inflation which Senators so seriously apprehend from the suggestion of the issuance of certificates of indebtedness bearing no interest.

Mr. SHERMAN Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. THOMAS. With pleasure.

Mr. SHERMAN. To lend some force to the Senator's position, would it not be well to remember that there is not an actual exchange of money but what is equivalent to money? Some Government obligations or issues would pass in lieu of money, but upon the extension of the loan it would merely be a credit in this country to an amount equal to the issue of the obligations or the loan of our credit to the foreign government, and thereby it would add to the possible inflation. At the end of the period when the credit was to be settled up it would merely be the payment of the balance. If I borrow the supposed $10,000 from a bank I do not carry that $10,000 in currency or in gold away with me. I get credit at the bank, and as a matter of fact in the payment of debts, the purchase of supplies, the payment of wages it is merely a credit, and no actual money may ever be changed in the hands or go from the bank. Would it not be the same in the extension of credit here? Would there not be some additional danger of an inflation of credit in the real method of doing business?

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. SHERMAN. As a rule it is true we do not do a cash business except in certain emergencies. Even at the grocery shop, where credit is extended, we pay by check.

Mr. THOMAS. That is true, Mr. President.

Mr. President, when these interruptions began I was about to emphasize my approval of the views of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] with regard to the raising of as much money as possible for our needs by taxation. For my part, I do not believe in war. Nobody in the sound of my voice does believe in it. It is the most terrible affliction to which mankind is subject. Its hideous brutality is beyond the conception of man. Its destruction of life and of property and its arrest of civilization are too obvious for discussion.

I want to see a resort to every possible means for the prevention of war, and my impression is that one effectual preventive is to make the nations engaged in it pay as they go instead of shifting the tremendous expense of conflict upon the shoulders of unborn generations. Napoleon was perhaps the greatest captain in the military history of the world, and the greatest of all his achievements was his ability to pay his expenses as they were incurred. He left no enormous legacy of millions and billions of debt upon posterity. He took with a strong hand, it is true, the hand of autocracy fortified by absolute power, but he paid as he went, and in the countries which he devastated as in his own, peace became possible for a considerable length of time largely through that fact and through the necessity of recuperation from the beginning unburdened by the hideous specter of an unpayable national debt.

I know we can not raise over $5,000,000,000 instantly. Consequently there should be a distribution of a part of this burden between ourselves and posterity. But, Mr. President, when nations reach the point where their consciousness of a sense of obligation, where the necessity of yielding up their wealth at the time for the meeting of these expenses becomes a settled rule of conduct, wars and rumors of wars will largely cease.

There is and must be payment sometime theoretically. There is always a payment of the annual interest absolutely. It comes around with unvarying regularity to governments as it does to individuals. When this war is over and the enormous burden of our expenditures will probably be doubled by the amount of our national debt, and the prosperity engendered by war and false and feverish activities shall have dwindled, hard times will come, and taxes constitute an unbearable burden upon the shoulders of the people. Your conduct and mine to-day will be called in question. We may not be here. Your children and mine, however, must bear the burdens which we create, and if in an emergency of this kind we are able to save even the pittance of $70,000,000 would it not be a little something to our credit when we are considering sums so colossal that the human mind staggers at the effort to contemplate them?

Mr. President, I have introduced this amendment with that end in view, not because I believe that mine constitutes the views of the majority of my colleagues upon this floor, but because I deemed it my duty to make it to the end that the opinions which I entertain on the subject may be spread upon the RECORD.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss this amendment at any length. I feel quite confident, however, that I am justified in making the statement that the minority will hardly be disposed to support this amendment. The Republican Party at least has always stood for sound money and sound monetary standards, and this is an attempt to revive the policy of the free and unlimited issue of fiat currency.

There has been sufficient criticism, Mr. President, about extravagance in expenditures during the last three or four years. Reference was made this morning to a list of projects which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] supplemented to a list which I referred to, projects for which loans were issued by the party in power, which would never have been attempted if the excuse had not been made of the war in Mexico and the approaching war in Europe. This war will doubtless be made the excuse for many extravagances yet to come and much maladministration. But I sincerely hope that there will be no considerable vote in this body to give ground for apprehension that there is any considerable number of Senators in favor of a proposition of this character.

The credit of the Government should be kept untarnished and unchallenged before the nations of the world, and we should not have infused into this discussion a proposition of this kind. I do not mean to say that the Senator from Colorado has not proposed the amendment seriously and defended it eloquently, but it certainly is not in line with sound monetary policy. It would lead, if persisted in, to a depreciation of the currency and an inflation and all the conditions which we witnessed to some extent during our own Civil War and which have been seen in the experiences of other nations to a much greater and more intolerable extent.

I hope the amendment will receive little or no support when it comes to a vote. It certainly will not receive the support of the minority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado offer his amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. The amendment is offered. I do not demand a yea-and-nay vote upon it. I know it is useless.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I had intended to call up the committee amendments first.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not care to interfere, and will let the committee amendments be first voted upon.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to taking a vote upon the amendment at this time.

Mr. THOMAS. I am willing to accede to whatever the Senator desires.

Mr. SIMMONS. It will be satisfactory to me to have a vote now.

Mr. President, I wish to say before the vote is taken that I sincerely trust the amendment will not be adopted. I think it is substantially the same proposition the Senator from Colorado presented during the last session when we were proposing a bond issue. I have no doubt myself that it would lead to very great inflation and, I fear, to business confusion.

So far as the President's declaration is concerned, I think the President had reference not to an inflation of the currency in the language he used, but to an inflation in prices, to vast increases in the prices resulting from the attempt to finance the whole war with bonds. But I do not care to discuss what the President meant by that further than to say this, Mr. President. The President certainly did not express any hope in the language used other than that a reasonable part, probably the major part of the expenses of the war should be financed by taxation.

The present proposition provides that something near $2,000,000,000 be raised from taxation. We will probably raise by taxation, to defray the expenses of the Government and to cover the expenses of preparedness undertaken before the war, about $1,300,000,000. So our total tax levy will be something near $3,300,000,000 for the fiscal year 1918. I think that is enough to demand of the present generation. I think that is in accord with the suggestion of the President. Of this money, leaving out the amount that we are going to exchange in bonds with the allies, we will probably raise by taxation $3,300,000,000, and this is a proposition to raise a still larger amount by taxation.

Mr. BORAH. The President evidently did not have in mind the figures the Senator is speaking of. The President in his address was speaking entirely of the future. He understood precisely that the ordinary running expenses of the Government and the indebtedness incurred had to be met by ordinary appropriation bills, and he was discussing entirely the one proposition of meeting the situation which would arise after the declaration of war.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; but the Senator recognizes the fact that in the present levy of taxes, amounting to $1,300,000,000, probably $600,000,000 is for preparedness purposes. If you add that to the nearly $2,000,000,000 now proposed to be raised by taxation you have something like $2,600,000,000 for war purposes that we propose to raise by taxation, against $2,000,000,000 to be raised by bonds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has said that every Senator in this Chamber ought to express his views about this bill, and I feel it is proper that he should. We have heard a great deal about the enormous burden to be imposed upon the people and upon posterity in the yearly taxes that must be assessed to meet the provisions of this measure, and the statements have not been exaggerated. There is no question but that we are facing a situation fraught with tremendous consequences. There will be caused many a heartache to those who will lose their kindred in the awful conflict, and hardships will be visited upon the people who have to pay these large amounts in taxes. But, Mr. President, war has been declared. It becomes the duty of the people of the United States to respond in a manner that will admit of no doubt as to their loyalty, in a way that will cause no delay in the prosecution of the war, and with such unanimity of purpose as will bring the conflict to as speedy a termination as possible. That result, it seems to me, will be accomplished by appropriating a very large amount and by voting it so that it can be used with powerful effect at the beginning of the war.

Mr. President, while this is the greatest appropriation of money that has ever been made by any nation in the history of the world, yet there are compensations likely to come out of this war that will give to us the recollection of pride and satisfaction in our vote of to-day.

There are three things in my judgment that will result from our entering into the war, three blessings, and if we shall get them, or any of them, there will be ample compensation accruing to the people of the United States.

I. FREEDOM OF THE SEAS.

The first is the freedom of the seas; the great oceans are the highways for the transportation of passengers and the movement of commerce. Our right to the peaceful use of those highways is clear. Those rights are worth to this Nation, as well as to the other nations of the world, the expenditure of enormous sums of money. To deny them is to take a step backward to the time of the Dark Ages, when nations wantonly disregarded the rights of others and piratical incursions were considered legitimate. Consequently if we shall establish as a principle no longer to be disputed that the freedom of the seas is secure to all nations at all times, we shall have gained something of inestimable value to the progress of the world.

II. INTEGRITY OF TERRITORY OF NATIONS.

A second great result is bound to come. We shall establish the right of the smaller nations to the integrity of their territory. That right theoretically has been acknowledged, but even in this age it sometimes is not respected, and in the ages of long ago it rested solely upon the power of the nation to safeguard it. If the principle of integrity of territory is established, we shall gain another principle which must of necessity follow, and that is that wars of conquest, acts of seizing land by force of arms, will be considered as under no circumstances justifiable, and the vain excuses put forward upon which to wage a war of aggrandizement will be regarded in the future with such universal condemnation, if this war terminates favorably for us, that no nation will dare resort to such a course. Crowned heads have never considered it possible that a powerful nation would enter a war to enforce international law, but hereafter they will always reckon with that factor in determining whether they shall undertake a war of conquest. Thus the doctrine of might making right will be completely overthrown. The greed of nations for territorial acquisition has been the underlying cause of nine-tenths of the wars of the world. The far-reaching effect of the universal recognition of this principle can hardly be estimated. Our benefit and the world's benefit can not be measured in dollars and cents.

III. DEMOCRATIZATION OF NATIONS.

Mr. President, there is a third and still greater principle that, in my judgment, ultimately will be established by our entrance into this war, and that is the democratization of nations.

When Thomas Jefferson wrote the words in the Declaration of Independence that "the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed," I doubt if even he fully realized the importance of that doctrine to the people of other countries. That principle already has exerted an influence upon the government of every nation on the face of the globe. Every absolute monarchy has yielded some form of legislative tribunal in obedience to that elementary doctrine. We observe it steadily marching forward, setting up republics, not alone in the Western Hemisphere, but in all parts of the earth.

In this war there are arrayed upon one side the peoples who are trying to establish this doctrine in all the governments of the world. If we are victorious, if we are to have a voice in the peace settlement and in the treaties thereafter to be made, our participation will advance that principle still further to the forefront and will ultimately establish it universally as the right and heritage of man.

In the acceptance of that principle of government there is developed a most beneficial effect upon the individual. The idea that men should be governed without their consent was universally enforced not many years ago, but with the growth of the principle which our Declaration of Independence put forth and which is now acknowledged all over the world as a coming and a growing principle, we shall witness when the war is over, with deep and abiding satisfaction, that not only the governments but each individual in all the nations of the earth will have that right and the enjoyment of liberty, which is so dear to the American heart, and which it seems to me will become equally dear to the citizens of every other country.

Therefore, although this war is going to be costly and may be long, nevertheless, there are blessings that are likely to come out of it that will fully compensate us. They are the establishment of the principles of, first, the freedom of the seas; second, the territorial integrity of nations, with the resulting condemnation of wars of conquest; and, third, the democratization of nations, with their recognition of human rights.

With those ends in view it seems to me we can well afford to vote for this bill, believing that it is the big movement toward these great reforms.

Mr. President, this is the first time in the history of the world that a nation has entered a great conflict willing to spill its blood and spend its treasure without any hope of reward or fear of punishment, but solely for the establishment and recognition of those rights of nations and of mankind which will tend toward producing universal peace. When these principles have been recognized the incentive for war will have been taken away, and a great movement will follow for the establishment of a world's court for the determination of international disputes, with power to enforce its decrees. Let us welcome the day when there will exist "Peace on earth, good will to men."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not going to enter into a discussion of the measure before us, but I desire to say a word before I shall be called upon to record my vote upon it.

There are two propositions contained in this measure: First, the one of raising sufficient funds by means of bonds to be issued and of certificates of indebtedness to meet the expenses connected with the expenditures which we in this country must make of our own for meeting the great conflict in which we are about to engage. So far as that portion of the bill is concerned, the part which has to do with covering our own expenditures and taking care of our own finances, I offer no criticism further than to say that, in my judgment, we could well have afforded to have raised more of this money by taxation and less by the issuance of bonds. We could in no way show our patriotism better than to show a greater willingness to meet this burden ourselves and less readiness to pass it on to the next generation. We have declared war; now let us follow it up by offering our own wealth and not put it so willingly and so largely on others.

As I understand the bill, we propose to provide for $2,000,000,000 in the way of indebtedness, represented by certificates, which is supposed to represent the portion that we propose to meet by taxation, and five billions is represented in bonds, which is the amount that we propose to pass on to the future and to permit our children and our children's children to take care of. Of course, in that $5,000,000,000 is included the $3,000,000,000 which we propose to exchange for bonds of foreign countries. As I have said, that portion of the bill meets with my approval, with the single suggestion which I have made, that had I been drafting the bill myself, whether wisely or unwisely, I should have pursued a different course with reference to the amount which we should raise by immediate taxation.

Mr. President, with reference to the other portion of the bill, that which provides for three billions of bonds to be exchanged for the bonds of other governments engaged in this war against the common enemy, my objections to it are fundamental. If I were permitted to vote upon that matter as a separate proposition, I should vote against it. If it were presented in such a way that I could meet it without at the same time voting against that which I deem to be vital and essential to the situation, I should undoubtedly record my judgment against it. I realize, of course, that in the exigencies of war we must do all and everything which is necessary to most effectively meet the situation and to most speedily and conclusively bring the war to a close. But, in my judgment, the chain of evil consequences to flow from this peculiar and particular kind of transactions and from others which will follow are such that I could not, upon any information which I have and upon any facts which have been furnished to the Senate up to this time, approve of that portion of the bill. In my judgment, we will get less results and less benefit from the money invested in this way than in many other ways in which it could be invested and expended, and when I say results I do not mean financial results, I mean results in the war and as to the successful carrying on of the war.

This is not the time nor the occasion to discuss in full my objections to this course. If I felt that by discussion I could effectuate any change whatever, I would gladly enter upon it. But I realize that no change in the program can be brought about, and I shall not draw upon the patience of the Senate by a discussion which would have no other effect than that of explaining more fully my own position. At some later time and at no distant date, I hope to discuss this matter in connection with other important matters relating to our connections with foreign governments. Suffice it to say now that, upon any information which I have or any reasons which have been given at this time, I could not support that measure if it were not intermingled and intertwined with the bill as a whole. I might, of course, move to strike out, but that would be but a consumption of time.

I, of course, desire to yield all proper consideration to the views of others, and I realize, too, very fully that in emergencies like this we can not always have our individual views to prevail. But upon some questions I entertain such convictions that I feel bound to keep the RECORD in accordance with my judgment.

I shall vote for the bill as a whole because I realize the importance of acting quickly and effectively. Perhaps it was not necessary for me to even reserve my views upon this matter, but to me it seems of sufficient consequence to have done so.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, very briefly I desire to amplify a little the suggestion just made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

I intend to vote for the pending bill; I intend to vote for every measure which will give the United States strength to carry on the conflict upon which it now has entered. I was somewhat reluctant to declare war, but, now that war has been declared, now that war is upon us, I believe that it ought to be carried to a successful termination as quickly and as energetically as is possible with the American Nation. There is no sacrifice of money or of life too great if necessary to accomplish this purpose.

I feel, however, that we are about to commit a grave mistake with respect to that part of the bill to which the Senator from Idaho has referred. I believe that we ought to spend our money for the people of the United States alone. I agree that to succor and to aid the allies may be the most important thing which the United States can do in its own interest; but when we do succor and aid them for our own interest, for our own welfare, what we do ought not to entail any obligation from any foreign country in the world toward us; what we do we should do for our own people and our own sake.

I am perfectly willing to give to any of the allied nations the money which they need to carry on our war, for it is now our war. I would give it to them just as freely as I would vote to equip an army or to maintain a navy of our own; but I shrink from the consequences that will, in all human probability, flow from the course which is suggested in this bill. I do not want the United States to become the bond creditor of Great Britain or of France or of Russia or of Italy; I do not want to enter the entangling alliance which the possession of these evidences of indebtedness will inevitably create. I should like to give to the allied nations $3,000,000,000, if they need the contribution, with never a thought of its repayment at any time or under any circumstances; I should like to give that or whatever sum may be thought needed as our donation to one phase of our own war; but I fear that in the years to come the fact that the United States has in its possession bonds of these great countries, which when they emerge from the war will all be bankrupt, will create an embarrassment from which the men of those times will find it difficult to escape. I think it will cost us more to take those bonds and to hold them against these Governments than it would cost us to give the money, with a generous and patriotic spirit, to do something which for the time being, for the moment, we are unable to do with our own Army and our own Navy.

I do not intend to enlarge upon this thought. I find it difficult to forget the teachings of the fathers of the Republic; I find it difficult to rid myself of the learning and the foresight of the men who created the Republic and who understood, I think, better than we can understand it, the high necessity of complete separation from the turmoil and the perplexities of European policies and politics.

I have said this because I wanted it to be understood that I give my vote for the money without a single reservation, hoping that it will be well spent, and having no reason to believe that it will not be well spent; but if I could have had my way, I would have contributed to the cause whatever we think is necessary in order to make the war successful, instead of creating an indebtedness, which for all time to come, if it be not absolved, will bind the American Republic to the affairs of Europe.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, no one has desired more than I that our country might avoid being dragged into this European struggle. I have been intensely for peace; but from the time that the German Government issued its last notice, declaring a war zone around all of its enemies, many miles in length and many miles in width, and announced the purpose to destroy with submarines the vessels of neutrals without notice, and to destroy the lives of neutrals on those vessels without notice, I have seen no escape from war unless Germany abandoned her announced purpose.

I believe that it is the duty of every Government to protect the rights of its citizens everywhere, and that no Government can excuse itself from protecting those rights except by admitting weakness and inability to protect them. We might have taken the course of ordering our citizens to keep off vessels and to keep their vessels out of that territory, but such a course, under the existing circumstances, would have been unworthy of the great Nation of which we are a part. There was therefore nothing to do but to arm our vessels and let them go through the proscribed zone, and then when Germany insisted on firing upon them and they fired in return a state of war existed.

There was nothing for us to do except what we did do a few days ago, namely, to declare that a state of war existed. It is useless now to discuss the events that preceded the notice from Germany of her purpose to conduct the submarine warfare against neutral vessels. Now the state of war exists, and the question is how are we to play our part in it.

We all hope that it may not last a great length of time, but every patriot is determined to back his Government with his life, with his last dollar, if necessary, to bring this war to a successful conclusion.

Every exercise of sound judgment must teach us that the best thing for us to do, and the only thing for us to do, is to mobilize as speedily as possible every resource of our country, and put it actively and forcefully into the struggle at the earliest moment possible.

Our Navy must do all that it can; additional small craft must be built that we may as effectively as possible seek to clear the war zone, or help to clear it, of submarines. Vessels must be built, and we must see to it that our allies across the water are supplied with those things necessary to them, both food and munitions, to aid in conducting the war. We must mobilize men and organize an Army as rapidly as possible.

I shall not discuss the bill in its minuter details. I only wish to refer to the three principal propositions—the $3,000,000,000 of bonds to be issued to raise a fund to loan to our allies, the $2,000,000,000 for a bond issue not for immediate payment, and the $2,000,000,000 of Treasury certificates, which are short-time paper and are for speedy payment. What our allies ask is not a gift; they do not desire a gift from us to maintain their armies or their vessels. We will spend the money to maintain our Navy and to construct the vessels which we need and to create our Army. That will be our money, but they desire and expect to spend their own money to maintain their armies and their navies, and what they ask of us is the use of our credit to aid them in making purchases needed here in the United States. If we loan them our credit, we will save them the cost of selling their bonds; we will lessen much of the cost now upon them in their purchases, and we will reduce greatly, I trust, the rate of interest that their loans cost them.

This bill proposes an issue of $3,000,000,000 of 3½ per cent bonds, the money derived from their sale to be loaned to our allies who engage with us in this war. They propose to give us their bonds with a date of maturity somewhat earlier than those we issue, but with the same rate of interest. We hope thus to facilitate their obtaining at 3½ per cent, with no commissions, no cost, the necessary funds they now desire through our aid.

I do not fear the consequences of such an extension of credit. It may be difficult for some time for our allies to meet these bonds. I see no reason to fear entangling alliances. I believe it will create a spirit of good will on the part of the Russian people toward the United States. There has always been an affection on the part of the people of France for us, and I believe it will make closer our friendly relations with them and be helpful for the future.

The $2,000,000,000 of bonds that we issue, with dates not for immediate payment, for our own expenses may not all be sold; may not all be required. It is an authorization to issue. We are preparing revenue bills to raise what revenue we legitimately and properly can from immediate taxation. This is a provision to cover the necessities of the situation as the necessities arise.

The $2,000,000,000 of short-time certificates are not in any sense to be a permanent indebtedness. They are an authorization to issue short-time Treasury certificates bearing 3½ per cent interest, to run not in excess of 12 months. It is simply a power to the Treasury Department to use the national credit pending the sale of bonds and pending the collection of revenue. It in no sense constitutes an additional public indebtedness. It does not mean that we are creating a continuing indebtedness of $7,000,000,000. The continuing indebtedness is $5,000,000,000, $3,000,000,000 of which are to be covered by the bonds of the nations to whom we furnish the money. I do not think we have ever called so far for quite that much. We may not use them all, but it puts the power in the President to render this aid, if the aid is required.

I desire again to call attention to the fact that the provision for $2,000,000,000 of short-time certificates simply gives authority to use the credit of the Government pending the sale of the $5,000,000,000 of bonds and pending the raising of revenue by tax levies.

I have studied this bill very carefully. I believe it is very wisely prepared. The $2,000,000,000 of bonds for our own expenses will only be used in case it becomes necessary to use them, in case the taxes to be raised are not sufficient to meet the necessary expenses. We are about to provide equipment for a large Army. This will involve a great outlay, not exhausted in a year, an outlay of munitions, of cannon and guns and equipment. I trust it may not be required for actual use, but, if it is needed, the quicker we get ready to furnish it the better.

I vote for this bill, as large as the issue of bonds is, with confidence in its wisdom, satisfied with its detailed provisions, believing it is carefully and well prepared.

It gives great power to the President, it is true; but I have confidence in the ability of the President, and I wish further to add that I have great confidence in the ability of the Secretary of the Treasury. I served three years and a half with Mr. John G. Carlisle when he was Secretary of the Treasury, than whom I never came in contact with a man possessing a greater intellect. I have observed the work of the present Secretary of the Treasury for the last three years and a half, participating in some of it, as he has been in constant association with the members of the Finance Committee of the Senate in the preparation of revenue bills. I had occasion to observe his work in connection with the preparation of the banking and currency act, and no man rendered greater assistance in the preparation of that measure than did he. I observed his work in connection with the preparation of the farm-loan banking act; I watched him as he directed the management of the finances of his country in the summer of 1914, when we were threatened with general liquidation, and I wish to state here that I believe the time will come—and it should be here now—when he will be recognized as one of the ablest and most valued Secretaries of the Treasury that ever filled that great office. No Secretary of the Treasury has ever made a better record or rendered greater service.

I do not desire to detain the Senate in the discussion of this measure. I vote for it with perfect confidence in its wisdom.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It seems to me there is an ambiguity in section 1 of the bill, and I should like to call the Senator's attention to the language. In reading the first paragraph on page 2 I have been unable to make up my mind whether the intention is to permit the United States and the various States to levy inheritance taxes upon fortunes, including United States bonds.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have no doubt about the meaning of the language used.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, let me read the sentence to the Senator. It is as follows:

> The principal and interest thereof shall be payable in United States gold coin of the present standard of value and shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation imposed by authority of the United States,

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That ends that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then follows a comma and the word "or."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It continues:

> or its possessions.

That ends that. Then it starts over again——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And reads:

> or by authority of any State, except estate or inheritance taxes.

Now, what I fear is that the point may be raised that, while the States will still be allowed to levy inheritance taxes, the inheritance taxes levied by the United States shall not apply to these bonds.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not think such a construction is possible. I am glad the Senator calls it to my attention. Now, let us see. Let us turn to the punctuation to tell what it means.

The Senator says that at the word "except" it starts all over. Not at all. "From all taxation imposed by authority of the United States," comma, "or its possessions," comma, "or by authority of any State," comma. Those three clauses each occupy the same relation. The comma separating the word "State" in the eighth line from the word "except" puts the three propositions—the authority of the United States, the authority of its possessions, and the authority of any State—in exactly the same status and causes the following language to qualify each of the three preceding clauses, and "except estate or inheritance taxes" applies to each.

I do not think there is any doubt about that being the correct construction. That is my view of its meaning.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it ought to be specifically stated after "the United States" as well as after "any State." I do not think we ought to leave a possibility of having the limitation apply only to States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The comma after the word "State" necessarily carries the "except estate or inheritance taxes" back to each of the other three clauses and modifies each of the three. If it were intended to carry the meaning feared by the Senator, there should be no comma separating the word "State" from the word "except," and it should read "or by authority of any State except estate or inheritance taxes," limiting the effect of the "estate or inheritance taxes" simply to the State.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There would not be any question about the meaning if it read in this way:

> Shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation imposed by authority of the United States, except estate or inheritance taxes, or its possessions, or by authority of any State, except estate or inheritance taxes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; but you would use the words "except estate or inheritance taxes" twice when it is not necessary, I think, to do so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is a matter of such vast importance, and there is such a possibility of the contention, because in all of our legislation heretofore the language used has been very clear that men who held bonds of the United States were exempt from the payment of any taxes, either upon the principal or the interest, and that is repeated here—that they shall be exempt, both as to principal and as to interest, from all taxation imposed by the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Our general inheritance tax now does not exempt Government bonds.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I expect not, but it specifically provides that they shall not be exempt. The Senator will understand that what I am afraid of is that the exception being placed at the end of that sentence, it might be contended in court that it was intended only to apply to the various States and not to apply to the United States; and it is a matter of such large importance, and the temptation is so great for large owners of Government bonds to set up the claim that their inheritances are not the subject of these taxes, that I think we ought to be specific.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the suggestion of the Senator were carried out, then, on line 8, after the word "possessions," the comma would be stricken out and the words "except estate or inheritance taxes" would be added, and then, after the word "State," the comma would be stricken out, so that the words "except estate or inheritance taxes" would apply solely in that sentence to "by authority of any State."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In other words, I do not believe in depending upon a comma when the words can be inserted specifically.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Personally, I do not object to the insertion of the words, Mr. President; but a comma creates a meaning just exactly as the use of words does in grammatical construction. I do not see how any other construction could be put upon it. I am sure that the construction desired by the Senator from Nebraska is the construction which the committee places upon it. As I have said, I am perfectly willing to have the suggested amendment made if it relieves the mind of any Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question, if I may, in connection with the same paragraph.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. I think it would somewhat relieve this language of ambiguity if, instead of the phrase "or by authority of any State," we changed the language so as to read "or by any State or local authority." That is the phraseology we used in connection with the taxation on the farm loan bonds, and I suggest that for this reason: For instance, in my own State we have State taxes, county taxes, municipal taxes, and township taxes, and the question might arise as to whether, under this phraseology, the bonds would not be subject to municipal taxes. I do not believe they would be, because municipal authorities derive their authority from the States, but I think it would make it very much clearer if we should use the language I have suggested.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the language "by any State or local authority" is preferable to the language used here. I think the use of that language would be an improvement.

Mr. POMERENE. I move to amend, then, Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suppose the committee amendments will be disposed of first.

Mr. POMERENE. I think that is true, if objection is raised; but as we were discussing it, it occurred to me that that would improve the phraseology.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio offer the amendment he has in mind?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; I do offer it, if there is no objection to it, now.

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not understand what the phrase was.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio offers an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

Mr. POMERENE. On page 2, line 8, I move to strike out the words "or by authority of any State," and in lieu thereof substitute the words "or by any State or local authority." That is the phraseology used in the farm-loan act.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would suggest that the Senator make it read "State or local taxing authority."

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Mississippi suggests "or by any State or local taxing authority." I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 8, it is proposed to strike out the words "or by authority of any"——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that that go over until after the committee amendments are agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection.

Mr. SMOOT. I make that request so that we may study what effect it will have. As far as I am personally concerned, I think the language as it now stands in the bill is just as plain as it can possibly be; and I do not want to make any hurried amendment here. Therefore I ask that it go over until the committee amendments are disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will go over.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I have some hesitancy in obtruding myself on the Senate this afternoon—the natural hesitancy of a new Member who would rather prefer to simply listen to the discussion of a measure of such great importance and by his vote indicate that he had profited by it. I shall vote for the bill; but if I had my way about it I would make the bond issue $6,000,000,000 and the certificates of indebtedness one billion, and for this reason:

During the past year and a half we have been compelled, through the needs of the Treasury, to increase materially the direct taxes levied upon the people of the Nation. These taxes are in a measure a hardship; not too much for the people to bear, but yet considerable. It is proposed, if we are to judge from the statement in the press of yesterday emanating from the Secretary of the Treasury, to increase these taxes considerably; to such an extent, it seems to me, as to warrant the fear that we may stifle industry, that we may materially affect enterprise.

I am, indeed, very much concerned that the sale of the bonds provided for by this bill shall be a great success. If it is otherwise it will be a serious thing, indeed, for the Nation. Since the beginning of the war England has approached the raising of taxes and the issuing of bonds with an eye single to protecting the great business interests of the British Empire. In the beginning she increased her income taxes moderately, and then, as the needs of the war demanded, she proceeded, step by step, until now she is levying an income tax about equal to what is proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

I do not know what plan the Secretary of the Treasury has in mind, but I assume that it is his intention to issue these bonds in amounts of $1,000,000,000 at a time. I know that the country is hopeful that the great majority of the bonds will be taken up by real popular subscription. I presume they will be issued in small enough denominations to warrant their purchase by people of moderate means. But, Mr. President, I am of the opinion that the country is not yet fully aroused to the seriousness of the situation confronting the Nation. I am not certain that just at this time the smaller business men, the smaller bankers, and farmers throughout the country will be disposed to put their money into bonds at 3½ per cent interest, when the average man in every community needs all the money he can get to conduct his business. Undoubtedly some of these bonds will be taken up in the country at large, but——

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. I suppose the Senator is referring to section 5. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not believe there will be a patriotic market for the bonds in the country at 3½ per cent?

I have not been quite able to understand why it is that when these bonds are put out at 3½ per cent we follow with the other provision in section 5 that if, at any time prior to December 31, 1918, other bonds shall be issued at a higher rate of interest, these bonds shall bear that higher rate of interest. I believe there is a great deal of patriotism in the country that will manifest itself in taking these bonds at 3½ per cent. Does not the Senator believe that that is true?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I am hopeful that what the Senator suggests is true. I am, however, uncertain as to whether the country is sufficiently aroused to the danger besetting us to induce men from all parts of the Nation to take their money out of interest-bearing investments paying 5 and 6 per cent and more and place it in these 3½ per cent bonds. If the country were really threatened, if the people of the Nation believed their homes and firesides were in grave danger, there would be no doubt of the Nation's responding in a matter of this kind.

Answering the Senator's second inquiry, my judgment is that if the rate of interest were made less than 3½ per cent, it is a question whether or not the bonds could be readily disposed of; and then again there is a possibility that before the year ends it may be necessary to make another issue of bonds. Perhaps it may be found then that the bonds can not be sold as readily as they may be at this time.

It is well enough for us to sell a hundred million dollars' worth of bonds or five hundred million dollars' worth, but we are proposing to float the biggest bond issue, by many billions, that this country has ever thought of, and we can not afford to make a mistake in a matter of such vital importance. My judgment is that the provision regarding the redemption of the bonds at a higher rate of interest is an excellent one, and is the best thing that could be done to assure the sale of the present issue.

I live in the city of New York. Congress has been accustomed of late to enact legislation requiring the people of my city to pay a very large proportion of the taxes collected in the country.

Of the income, corporation, and profits taxes to be collected from the entire country this year, I am told that the city of New York will pay approximately 50 per cent. I want to say to the Senators here that when the laws providing for these taxes were passed they heard little more than a protest from New York City. It is true that for a day or two the newspapers discussed the question, but after that they subsided. We knew the country was approaching difficult days, and the city of New York, as always in the past, was ready to respond to whatever call the Nation made. Many times in this Chamber men have criticized the patriotism of the metropolis, but I wonder if it is realized that in the Civil War my State contributed 450,000 soldiers to the cause for the preservation of the Union—20 per cent of all the men engaged in that conflict.

I will venture the statement, Mr. President, that in the first issue of these bonds, which will probably be $1,000,000,000, the business men and bankers of our city will take up at least 60 per cent.

I hope that the statement of the junior Senator from Iowa that the patriotic people of the Nation will subscribe for all of the bonds authorized by this bill may be correct. It will be a great pleasure to me, but I am afraid that something startling will have to occur before we can drive home to the citizenship of the Nation the necessities of the hour.

The point I wish particularly to make, Mr. President, before I take my seat, is this:

In the preparation of revenue measures, which we will be called upon to consider in a few days, I do hope that the Finance Committee will be very careful that they do not submit legislation that will, in the end, kill the goose that lays the golden egg. I would, as was suggested by a distinguished Senator the other day, levy taxes at this time sufficient to carry the interest on these bonds, and then wait until next winter to enact well-considered legislation that would not be a great hardship upon some particular interest or locality of the country, that would not in the end be a serious detriment to enterprise and industry.

I submit these observations, Mr. President, hopeful that we will approach this subject with the greatest possible care, to the end that every issue of bonds will be made with the greatest possible consideration for the business of the country.

It has been asked what amount of the allies's bonds are held in this country. I am informed that there are approximately $1,500,000,000 worth of English and French war bonds held here to-day, upon which is paid a rate of interest approximating 6 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Six and a quarter per cent.

Mr. CALDER. Six and a quarter per cent. Now, with that in mind, we should, like England, approach all of these problems in such a way that the best interests of the Nation will be served.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, that the American people may understand that even a $7,000,000,000 loan is not a large contribution of the American people to the great war in which they are now engaged, I think it very proper to place in the RECORD the fact that the warring nations to-day have expended, in cash alone, about $80,000,000,000 in this war—eighty billions, as against our proposition now to expend seven billions to start with. Let us recall, also, that a little island not more than two-thirds the size of my State has, up to the present time in this war, furnished a credit of about forty billions, or one-half of the entire expenses of this great contest.

Nor is this all, Mr. President. While we are recognizing that we are putting $7,000,000,000 into this battle, we must not fail to recognize that we are not as yet putting in a single one of our American soldiers, while blood is being poured out by our allies in unstinted measure. Even during the winter months of February and March the reports from the British side in France showed an average loss of between 135,000 and 145,000 soldiers every month. That was on the British line alone. The French losses were probably nearly as great. It is probably true that more than a quarter of a million men are going down to death or are being wounded or captured every month during this contest. Therefore, while they are suffering to that extent, we ought to be mighty liberal in the expenditure of money when we can take no part in the real battle which to-day is the battle of the American people.

Let us not forget another matter, and that is the mighty strength and power of these great central countries, reaching from the Baltic on through the richest portions of Europe down to the Mediterranean. Here is Germany, with a population of about 70,000,000; here is Austria, with a population of about 60,000,000; and then we have Bulgaria, Roumania, now practically in the hands of the central powers, and Turkey. Not only is this country the richest section of the world, Mr. President, but with their military railways those great central powers can send an army from one section of one line to another section of that line in a very few hours. They have an enormous advantage over the entente countries in every respect, not only in the beginning of the war in their power and their ability and their science, but even up to the present time in the facilities for handling their millions of soldiers.

Nor is that all. Hell-born, there comes into this war another instrumentality of destruction—the submarine. No power has been able to cope with it. Great Britain, able to control the seas, to-day sees her merchant marine gradually going down at the rate of about 500,000 tons every month, and no method has yet been devised to meet that condition. I noticed in a paper that I received this morning that this country, to meet her share of the devastation by the submarines, should build 500,000 tons every month, with the expectation that that number of tons would go down to the bottom of the ocean every month.

Mr. President, with those conditions facing us I think we ought with liberal hand and with open heart to grant this call upon the American Treasury, and the bill ought to go through without a single dissenting vote.

Nor are these the only conditions that we must meet. Russia, great in population, great in territory, enormous in her resources, is to-day a negligible quantity in this great war. Having just emerged from the darkness of an autocratic form of government, I am fearful, Mr. President, that the light of liberty will blind her eyes and possibly make her unfit to be an aggressive factor. They not only need our cash but they need our sympathy, and, Mr. President, they need the leading hand of a great nation which has been able under all conditions to maintain a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. We will need to give them not only cash to sustain the Government, there, but all the influence and the power and the sympathy of this great Government should go out and be exercised for the benefit of the Russian people.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call attention to another fact in this great drama. We have not yet been able to find any character of warfare, any mechanism that can meet the devastation of this submarine warfare. I notice by a report which I received from the department this morning that there have been sunk of neutral vessels alone about 800 in number since the beginning of the war. In addition to this number of vessels about 73 have been attacked and escaped. I want to call the attention of the Senate and the American people to the mighty power of this submarine warfare, when nine out of every ten vessels that have been attacked have gone down to the bottom of the ocean. No such condition has ever been in the world before; never before has the devastation been so great. The enemy without the use of her warships, without the necessity of defending her own merchant vessels, can turn into the ocean this nest of rattlesnakes, whose stroke is always death and from which there so far has been comparatively no escape whatever.

Mr. President, there has never yet been anything invented by the human mind for the purpose of destruction that the same human mind has not been able to invent or produce something else to meet it and to destroy its effect. I believe if to-day we will provide the proper facilities and invite the inventive genius of the American people not alone in our Army and Navy but throughout all the great industries of the country and give them an opportunity to develop their ideas, give them the incentive of good pay if they succeed in their invention in producing any character of mechanism that will protect the hull of a ship from the stroke of the torpedo, we could invest our money in no better possible way, and I believe that that ought to be done.

But this is our initial step, and we ought, in my opinion, not only as a duty which we owe to ourselves but a duty which we owe to those who are now fighting our battles across the sea, to vote this $7,000,000,000 without a dissenting voice.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I shall vote for this bill without any apology. I hope it will pass with no dissenting vote. It demonstrates that there is no half-heartedness in this conflict, that we are doing the best thing we can do, and doing it speedily. There should be no dilly-dallying; this is no halfway measure. Our action must be speedy to be available.

This tremendous sum rather staggers us; but, Mr. President, it will stagger the enemy of our country a good deal more. It will cause the thoughtful people in this country to realize the stupendousness of the task we have undertaken, and they must realize it, for this Nation of ours is on trial; Congress is on trial; the people are on trial. There is a mighty union of patriotism in this Nation that never fails in the hour of need. The call has gone out to mobilize industries and for a greater food supply. It will be done. The people of this country realize their duty to raise more foodstuffs, and they demand also that Congress perform its duty and see that there is no speculation in the foodstuffs which the people will raise.

The people trust the President in giving him this great power. They want to know, and they have a right to know, that the money shall be expended carefully and economically, and a strict accounting made therefor.

I have heard some things said here to-day concerning these loans and whether or not they will ever be paid. I want to say this for myself, Mr. President, that I hope one of these loans, if we make it, will never be paid and that we will never ask that it be paid. We owe more to the Republic of France for what it has done for us than we can ever repay. France came to us with money, with a part of her army, with a navy, in the hour of our sore distress, and without the aid of France it is doubtful if we would have had this Nation of ours. I know we are told that during the Civil War France did not treat us well, but that was not the people of France.

I walked on Sunday to the square near the White House and stood in meditation at the great statue erected by this Government to Rochambeau and reflected upon the words on that statue—the words of Washington:

We have been contemporaneous and fellow workers in the cause of liberty and we have lived together as brothers should do—in harmonious friendship.

Splendid sentiment—prophetic at this time.

And then my mind in vision went out to that scene when at old Independence Hall a crowd applauded Rochambeau and his followers as they marched by on their way to Yorktown. We owe much to him.

Then, on the other corner of that square stands the monument erected to the man whose name arouses every emotion of our nature, and has from boyhood days—Lafayette. The mind wanders in vision to the time when he as a young Frenchman presented himself to Washington just before the British fleet came into our waters; and there passes before one the memory of Germantown, Brandywine, Valley Forge, and Yorktown. A nation that would forget what France has done for us, what Lafayette has done, would be a nation that was losing its virility. I never want to see this Government ask France to return the loan which we may make to her. I want further to see us match her Lafayette with a Roosevelt. What an inspiration to see the Stars and Stripes waving for the lilies of France!

Now, Mr. President, it is said that money talks. It does; and this large amount of money, which will amaze the world, will be very vocal. It carries a message to the American people—a message that they must practice frugality and thrift and turn from extravagance. It says to them that this is a mighty task to which the great Republic has dedicated itself. It carries a message to the Kaiser that the Republic of the West is in deadly earnest, and that he may as well awaken now from his dream of world power. To the boys in the trenches fighting for what is now our battle it carries a message of cheer. But the greatest message it carries is to bleeding, wounded, stricken France, with its cities burned, its fields destroyed, its fertile lands made a wilderness, rows upon rows of new-made graves, over a million men gone, another million injured and wounded, her treasure nearly spent. It carries to France this message: "When we were a young Republic in the family of nations, struggling along, hardly able to walk, you reached out and took our hand and helped us. Now we are the powerful one in that same great family of nations, and the big brother of democracy says to you that it is willing to give of its treasure and of its men enough to save you from the onslaught of the mad dog of autocracy."

That thought cheers me in voting for this measure, regardless of the stupendous amount involved. We show to the world that Republics are not ungrateful and to France that the great American Republic does not forget.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I will engage the Senate but a moment. In the shadow of this desperate emergency which I had hoped would never fall across the pathway of duty there is but one thing for the American people to do, and that is to present a militant, invincible front to the common enemy. The burden of taxation which this bill is going to lay upon the American people will be borne cheerfully, for the toiling masses are always cheerful and patriotic in the performance of a public duty, although it will press heavily upon them. Whether the amount appropriated by this bill is more than ought to be levied or not time alone will determine. I am not going to discuss that phase of the question at this late hour. I was in hopes that war might be averted. I did all that I could as a Senator to bring about a settlement of this question by negotiations. I believed then and believe now it ought to have been settled without bloodshed or a declaration of war. But Congress did not agree with me, and I must bow to the will of the majority. War has been declared. We have crossed the Rubicon, and now we must go to Rome regardless of the cost in blood and treasure. I do not like the idea of appropriating money to hire somebody else to do America's fighting. The substitute in war is not to me an admirable object. It may be that financial help to the allies will promote America's course and in that sense is excusable. It is not, however, profitable at this time to discuss that. The question of managing this campaign under our form of government devolves upon the President. Both in the capacity of a Senator and a private citizen I propose to do everything needful within my power to strengthen the arm of the Chief Executive and those who counsel with him in the management of this campaign. I am hoping and trusting they may bring the war to an honcrable, successful, and speedy end. Mr. President, I am going to vote for this bill. I do it with a heavy heart and some misgiving as to the outcome. I realize that a great many economic errors are liable to be committed. I am fearful that a great many things will be done in these abnormal times which we will all regret. It will require many years, I fear, to bring the old ship of state back to the moorings of the fathers, if, indeed, we shall be able ever to restore the old and better order of things. But, trusting that an All-Wise Providence may guide the Executive, and that prudence, patriotism, courage, and wisdom may characterize his every act, I am going to vote for the means.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I am going to support this bill, but not rapturously. It has been said that in a multitude of counsel there is safety, and there is no determined opposition to the passage of the bill here to-day, and I doubt if there will be one single vote against it.

But, Mr. President, I wish to speak along the line that might be of some service hereafter if not to-day. Necessity goads on progress and is the underlying fact that compels all material change and reforms. Necessity has compelled the courts to twist provisions of constitutions, it has compelled them to amend provisions of the Constitution; necessity has compelled our courts to abolish provisions of the Constitution. Necessity is the supreme law of war, and we are in war to-day.

Now, looking at the thing along that line, let us proceed a little further. Since we are in war, since necessity is the supreme law of war and force is the controlling factor, let us look at the thing as it really is. We went into this war, as I understood it, because we said to Germany, "Your submarine blockade and warfare interferes with our commerce; it must not be longer permitted." We then insured the ships and the cargoes to protect our commerce. We then armed our ships to protect the commerce further. We then declared war, that our commerce might be fully protected, and to-day we propose to lend the allies yonder money to buy supplies to be shipped in our commerce. We have certainly been good to our commerce.

That is the condition which confronts us to-day. It may be that necessity requires that it shall be done, but if you are looking along the particular line for the investment of your money, what do you get for this money when it is invested? Will one single ounce more of energy be brought to bear on the battle fields of Europe against our official enemy because of our lending this money to the allies? No. Will one single more submarine be destroyed because we are lending this money to the allies? No. That is, not the way we understand it now. These other nations are in the war, and it was a war in which they were at least engaged, if not commenced by them, and they were bound to use every ounce of their energy to bring it to a successful conclusion. They have been doing that. They have failed up to now. They must continue to do that, whether we lend them money or not. They can not quit.

We have entered the war, ostensibly at least, for a particular purpose. We are in the war now. We propose to spend our money, this much of it, and what will it be for? The practical effect of it will be what? To destroy submarines? No. There is Germany, our official enemy, 3,000 miles from American shores, with no army that can possibly be raised to bring here, and we are not in a position we might concede to go there. Germany has said that, notwithstanding you have declared war upon us, we do not propose to fight you at all; we are going to pursue the policy we have heretofore announced. That may be misleading. It might be to put us off our guard, but nothing has occurred, unless the newspaper story we heard to-day is true, to indicate to the contrary.

Those are the conditions, and we are advised to build more ships than can be sunk. Since we are in the war, and necessity is the only law of war, then let us consider these things as we go along. The bond issue is here. We propose the largest war budget of all time. We propose six times as much, five times as much, and four times as much in the first issue as all the first-class nations issued when they went into the war.

When it comes to the payment of these bonds—those are the conditions I want to speak a little about. The people are going to have to pay this money, and I will say that if wealth can be made to bear its just proportion of the expense and debt it ought to be made to do it.

I am not criticizing the policy that has been outlined, but it has not agreed with what I have always thought heretofore ought to be done. It has always pleased me to believe that American power and American prowess were sufficient to take care of and protect American rights in any land and on all seas. I have believed that we should not make entangling alliances with other nations all the time and up to now. It may be that we are not departing from that practice. I hope not to any great extent; we are going to have to pay these bills. I believe there ought to be such a bill proposed, and I understand there will be, to make the wealth of the country bear its just proportion of the war expenditures. If it does come about, however, a little later, on a change of administration, after this great expenditure has been authorized or debt incurred and a change of mode of taxation to indirect taxes is made, then the wealth will escape its just share of taxation for the payment of these bonds, and it will be shifted to the people who have already borne and will be compelled to bear a most unjust burden until the indebtedness is all discharged. I do not believe that this should occur, and I am not going that far down the line.

I merely wanted to say that I am going to support this measure, and I am going to support it, notwithstanding the views that I have had about it heretofore. I am going to support it because the administration says that this is the thing to do, and because at this time it seems we have agreed to this sort of a policy, and we may as well go ahead and let it appear that we are unanimously in favor of it. We must bring this war to a successful conclusion. I favor that regardless of what the cost may be in men and in money.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, just a few words. I think, perhaps, I deplore war as much as anyone, and I have always deplored war. Even as I pick up the evening paper and read and rejoice, too, at the news of to-day's French successes, I realize the tremendous loss in treasure and in men that these successes involve; but, Mr. President, the limit of forbearance with Germany has long since been reached; patience has ceased to be a virtue. We can no longer, not only in the interest of America and of American citizens, but in the interest of humanity and civilization itself, decline to take our part in this great war.

Mr. President, the outrages of the murderous submarine is, of course, without parallel in the history of war or of the world; and yet there was a time a while ago in the history of this war when it seemed as though our great Government, with its boasted civilization, its supposed fine sense of liberty and humanity, was going to acquiesce in the German Admiralty order of February, 1916, which was to sink without warning the merchant ships of the belligerents opposed to Germany, whether armed for purely defensive purposes or not. Oh, Mr. President, how proud we may be to-day that instead of having acquiesced in that kind of warfare, which has shocked humanity and which has shamed our civilization, we are in arms against it in the interest of freedom and liberty and humanity throughout the world. Since we are in this war, we want to be in it, Mr. President, in the most effective way. We can not now—that is impracticable—send an army abroad to fight on foreign soil, but we can, as we should, equip the allies with what we have—the sinews of war, the money, the means with which to fight not alone their battle but our battle, as well, as they have been fighting our battle, I think, all along in their resistance to the perfidious doctrine that might makes right and that necessity knows no law, as Von Bethmann-Hollweg declared upon the invasion of Belgium, while admitting the invasion was a violation of international law. Yes; we can assist them in that way.

We can—it has been in my mind for some time—render some material assistance in another way. We can help them in their relief to the Belgians, who are dependent upon them, by a gift now of at least $25,000,000, which will relieve the Belgians, and at the same time relieve France and Great Britain for a period of two months of the burden of supporting the dependent and helpless men, women, and children in that unfortunate territory.

To that end, I may say here, Mr. President, that I introduced a resolution the other day, which is now before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and which, I trust, will have the earnest consideration of that committee. That, however, is simply one way in which we can help and aid them. The bill itself before the Senate provides for the other practical and effectual means—the most effectual means—by which we can now aid them.

I said, Mr. President, that I deplored war, but nevertheless there never has been a bill before the Senate on which I cast my vote, and in regard to which I voted with less hesitation, than I voted for the war resolution the other day. So there is no bill likely to come before the Senate for which I shall vote with less hesitation than I shall vote for the bill now pending here.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, $7,000,000,000 represents a sum of money which is almost beyond the mind of man to comprehend, and yet the raising of that sum by our country for the purposes for which we intend it by this bill is as little as our Nation could do under the present world conditions. The bill provides a bond issue of $2,000,000,000, as well as an issue of short-term certificates of $2,000,000,000, for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the Government up to June 30, 1918.

The necessity for this action has been brought about by the declaration of war and the necessary expenses attached to the vigorous prosecution of the war. The Secretary of the Treasury tells us that in order to meet the expenses for the coming fiscal year for the Army alone an appropriation of at least $2,950,000,000 will be necessary. He also states that it will be necessary for our Navy to expend $550,000,000 more than was provided for it at the last session of Congress. Those two items, Mr. President, amount to about $3,500,000,000; and we know that in administering the affairs of the Government during war times, and particularly directing the expenditure of the mammoth appropriations which we are compelled to make, there will be entailed upon the Government of the United States an extra expense of from $80,000,000 to $100,000,000. It is for these reasons we must provide means for raising nearly $4,000,000,000 for the extra expenses of the Government for the balance of this fiscal year and the next fiscal year, ending June 30, 1918.

The $3,000,000,000 which we are proposing to raise by a bond issue for the purpose of advancing it to the allies, I believe, Mr. President, will all be repaid; but if it should not be, or if not one penny of it is returned, I wish to say now that every penny of it will be expended for the defense of the principles in which we believe and for which we entered the war to uphold.

The junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] asked the question, "Will one single ounce of additional energy be expended if this money is advanced to the allies?" He answered the question by saying "no." Why, Mr. President, the Senator certainly does not know the conditions existing in those countries, or he never would have made such an answer. I desire to say that the greatest present need of the allies is: First, ships; and, second, money.

Senators, there are hundreds of thousands of tons of merchandise ordered by France lying in different ports of this country which it is impossible to move, and meanwhile France is suffering from the delay in delivery. I speak of France because I think that France is suffering more than any other country for the supplies which she has ordered from our country and on which she is dependent. So far as I am personally concerned, I will say that if the President of the United States decides to extend to Russia a loan of $1,000,000,000 and takes in return the obligation of that country for the loan of the money, if it would enable the people of Russia to establish a republican form of government and forever relieve her of her past autocratic form of government, I would say "God grant that it be done," even if we knew beforehand that not one cent of the loan would be paid.

The senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] said that he believed we ought to spend our money for the benefit of the United States. So do I; and, Mr. President, I think that every dollar that will be expended under the provisions of this bill, if it is expended honestly, will be for the benefit of the United States, whether spent by us or by the allies.

I know that the countries involved in this war have a burdensome debt upon them which it will take, perhaps, a hundred years for some of them to pay; and I was going to say perhaps it would be impossible for some of them to ever pay their obligations incurred through the prosecution of the war. I notice that, according to the last reports, the United Kingdom has already issued war bonds to the amount of $15,550,000,000, all spent to the carrying on of the war and does not include the advances made to England by New Zealand, Australia, and Canada, nor does it include the money that she has expended on this war collected by taxation; but that amount represents solely what the United Kingdom has borrowed by bond issues for the purposes of the war. France has borrowed and issued her bonds for the same purpose to the amount of $10,532,000,000; Russia, $11,896,000,000; Italy, $2,520,000,000; Germany, $13,726,000,000; Austria, $3,659,000,000; Hungary, $1,730,000,000. These figures, Mr. President, do not include the amount that has been spent and borrowed by Turkey, by Bulgaria, by Serbia, and the other powers to whom money has been advanced, not only by England, but by Germany as well.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I will inquire where the Senator obtained those figures?

Mr. SMOOT. I obtained them from the statistician of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. STONE. What is the aggregate?

Mr. SMOOT. The aggregate of the bond issues of the world to-day——

Mr. STONE. I mean war issues.

Mr. SMOOT. The aggregate of the war bond issues of the world to-day is about $58,000,000,000.

Mr. STONE. Did the Senator state what the issues of the respective Governments engaged in the war amounted to?

Mr. SMOOT. I did as to each one.

Mr. STONE. I desired that information.

Mr. SMOOT. I can repeat the figures if the Senator desires me to do so.

Mr. STONE. The Senator need not repeat them, as they will appear in the RECORD in the Senator's remarks.

Mr. SMOOT. They will be in the RECORD to-morrow morning.

Mr. President, there has been some criticism of the bill because it provides that half of the money required by this Government for the purpose of engaging in this war is to be raised by means of a bond issue, and the other half by the issuance of short-time certificates, to be redeemed by the revenues to be provided by a bill which no doubt will be passed at this session of Congress. The Senator from Missouri thought we ought to increase the short-time certificate to $3,000,000,000 and decrease the bond issue to $1,000,000,000. Well, Mr. President, I know the Senator from Missouri is just as honest in his opinion as I am in mine; but I want to say that if the Congress of the United States should undertake to impose upon the people of the United States by direct taxation $3,000,000,000 over and above the amount of $1,300,000,000 imposed during the last session of Congress, it would discourage the business men of the country and upset the finances of the country, and place a burden upon the great mass of the people, greater than they uncomplainingly would bear. Have Senators thought upon how many classes of industries and upon how many individuals taxation must fall to raise by direct taxation $2,000,000,000? The estimate, Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. I will wait until the Senator concludes the sentence.

Mr. SMOOT. According to the suggestion made by the Secretary of the Treasury, as reported in the newspapers, one-half of the $1,800,000,000 to be raised by direct taxation is to be raised by an increase in the income tax over and above the increase provided at the last session of Congress and by additional taxation of excess profits of the corporations of the country. A half of it no doubt will be raised in that way; and as to the other $900,000,000 we will have to resort to every known form of direct taxation to raise it. Now, to add a billion dollars more I think would be most unwise and most unfortunate for the business interests and the people of the United States.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. The Senator is a very industrious and careful student of current affairs and current legislation. If we assume, as I think the circumstances would warrant us in assuming, that this war may end speedily, probably during the present year, if the greater half of what we are told by the news reports coming to us through friendly sources can be credited, it would look very much as if we were well past the beginning of the end. Now, I wish to take the judgment of the Senator as to this—and the question is based, of course, upon the theory that the war may end during the present year and before we really get into it physically. If that happens, and yet we go on preparing for it, does the Senator think it would be best for us to make that preparation for actual entrance into the war by the use of money raised through the issue of bonds—that is, borrowed money; borrowed to run through an indefinite future period—or to make that preparation on the basis of taxes to be actually laid and speedily collected?

Mr. SMOOT. In answer to the Senator, I will say that it is absolutely necessary to prepare for every emergency, and under this bill we do prepare for every known emergency. There is nothing in the bill that directs the Secretary of the Treasury to sell these bonds all at once, or even within the year, nor is he directed to sell the short-time certificates at any particular time; but he is authorized to sell them to meet the actual expenses of our Government; and that is exactly what I anticipate the Secretary of the Treasury will do.

Mr. STONE. Yes; but what does the Senator think should be first offered—the long-time bonds or the short-time certificates?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the short-time certificates will be sold first, or perhaps a part of each of the issues may be sold at once. So far as that is concerned, if the bonds were all sold at once and before the certificates, what the Senator says would be in part true. The form, the duration, and sale of the bonds provided for is left entirely in the discretion of the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator also, on the other hand, if the money is to be raised on the theory of imposing a new and onerous tax upon the people and the taxes are collected and put in the Treasury and then the war stops, what an injury has been done to the people of this country.

Mr. SMOOT. The suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut is so obviously correct that it must appeal to every Senator here.

Mr. President, there were a number of other things that I desired to say at this particular time, but the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge desires a vote upon it at a very early hour. Therefore I will conclude at this time.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I understand from the chairman of the committee that it is his intention to hold the Senate here until we vote on this measure.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is my desire.

Mr. PENROSE. Then I sincerely hope that without unduly cutting off any debate or any amendment we may get to a vote at an early hour and be able to keep such engagements as we may have made.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think we are ready now to begin voting upon the amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the first amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 5, after the numerals "$2,000,000,000," it is proposed to insert a comma and the words:

and such certificates shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation imposed by authority of the United States or its possessions or by authority of any State, except estate or inheritance taxes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I propose an amendment to that amendment, which I think the committee will be willing to accept. I propose to strike out the words "except estate or inheritance taxes" an insert the same words on line 7 after the word "taxation." I will state that that transposition makes it absolutely certain that the United States inheritance-tax power, as well as the State inheritance-tax power, will still exist.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, while I do not agree with the Senator from Nebraska in the doubt that he entertains, I have no objection to accepting the amendment which he proposes.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, lines 8 and 9, it is proposed, after the word "State," to strike out the comma and the words "except estate or inheritance taxes," and to insert the same words following the word "taxation," in line 7, with a comma after it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The modification has been accepted by the chairman of the committee. The question is on the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Also, on page 7, after line 9, it is proposed to insert a new section, section 7, as follows——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, for that amendment proposed by the committee I offer as a committee substitute the matter which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The substitute will be stated.

The SECRETARY. As a substitute for the amendment offered by the committee it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is hereby authorized to deposit in such banks and trust companies as he may designate the proceeds, or any part thereof, arising from the sale of the bonds and certificates of indebtedness authorized by this act, and such deposits may bear such rate of interest and be subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the committee withdraws the former amendment and substitutes this.

Mr. SIMMONS. The committee offers that as a substitute.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, our attention has been directed to the print. Now an amendment is offered on the floor, and read rather hurriedly. I should like to ask that it be read again.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is the same thing in substance.

Mr. REED. I do not think it is.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let the amendment to the amendment be reported first—the one the Senator from Massachusetts has just introduced.

Mr. REED. Very well.

The SECRETARY. Following the word "prescribed," the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to insert the following:

Provided, That in no case shall an amount so deposited exceed the amount withdrawn from such bank or trust company for investment in United States bonds or certificates of indebtedness authorized and issued under the provisions of this act: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall require as security for such deposits United States bonds or United States certificates of indebtedness or other securities of equivalent value equal to the amount of said deposit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Now let the Secretary read the substitute as it is proposed to be amended.

The SECRETARY. The substitute as proposed reads as follows:

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is hereby authorized to deposit in such banks and trust companies as he may designate the proceeds, or any part thereof, arising from the sale of the bonds and certificates of indebtedness authorized by this act, and such deposits may bear such rate of interest and be subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

To which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] proposes to add the following:

Provided, That in no case shall an amount so deposited exceed the amount withdrawn from such bank or trust company for investment in United States bonds or certificates of indebtedness authorized and issued under the provisions of this act: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall require as security for such deposits United States bonds or United States certificates of indebtedness or other securities of equivalent value equal to the amount of said deposit.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that, in the second or third line of the substitute which he has proposed, the words "such banks and trust companies" are used. I think he means "State banks." The word "such" does not refer to anything, if I understand the reading correctly.

Mr. SIMMONS. That makes it discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury to select the banks in which the deposits shall be made.

Mr. WEEKS. The Secretary now has the authority to deposit in the Federal reserve banks and in all member banks. We are giving him additional authority to deposit in State banks and trust companies; and, instead of using the word "such," I think the word "State" should be used.

Mr. SIMMONS. As the Senator says, the Secretary now has the power to make a deposit in a member bank; and when we give him authority to deposit in such banks as he may in his discretion select, of course the Senator is right in saying that it does not refer to any except State banks or trust companies.

Mr. WEEKS. What does the word "such" refer to?

Mr. SIMMONS. Such banks as he may select.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. May I ask that the amendment be stated again, just that part of it, so that we will see the connection?

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is hereby authorized to deposit in such banks and trust companies, as he may designate, the proceeds, or any part thereof——

Mr. SIMMONS. That would include State banks and member banks as well as trust companies.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Missouri to permit me, before he makes his statement, to say that so far as I am concerned, as the chairman of the committee and speaking for the committee, I accept the proviso which the Senator from Massachusetts has offered as an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I simply wanted to say that with the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] I do not think the clause is as objectionable as it was before.

I am not going to take the time of the Senate to discuss this provision. I have been engaged on committee work all day, and had I been here during the day I should have had something to say about it. I simply want to make a matter of record my protest against changing from the rule which requires that the fiscal transactions of our Government shall be through the Federal Reserve System. I believe that every inducement ought to be offered to banks to enter that system and that one of those inducements is to be found in the custom and rule which requires the Federal Government to transact its business through the Federal reserve banks.

I think this is a piece of unwisdom. This variation is not justified. I think the clause ought to have gone to the Banking and Currency Committee. I do not believe it has received proper consideration. I do not think it ought to be done. I do not ask that the matter be delayed, however, and I do not intend to discuss it further.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, for information, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether his amendment—which is not printed and was only read just now—limits the amount of deposits made by the Secretary of the Treasury out of the proceeds of the sale of the new bonds to the amount withdrawn from the respective banks for the purpose of investing in the new bonds?

Mr. WEEKS. It does.

Mr. PHELAN. Does that mean the investment by the banks and trust companies or the investment by the banks and trust companies and the depositors of the banks and trust companies?

Mr. WEEKS. It means deposits withdrawn by anyone for that purpose.

Mr. PHELAN. Then the bank must ascertain the purpose for which the depositor withdraws the money in order to get the benefit of the redeposit?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; exactly.

Mr. PHELAN. It is hardly in conformity with the usual practice of banks to inquire into the uses to which depositors put their invested funds.

Mr. WEEKS. It is a practice that is frequently followed, Mr. President. As the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has said, the Secretary of the Treasury has no authority to deposit moneys in these banks and should not do so. He should ordinarily deposit the money with banks which the law provides for that purpose; but in order to prevent the shifting of funds, greatly involving the financial situation, there has been an appeal that some of this money might be deposited in banks and trust companies from which it is withdrawn which do not belong to the Federal Reserve System. There is merit in that appeal. Therefore, if they get back from the Secretary as much money as is withdrawn for this purpose they can have no complaint, and that is as much as he should deposit in such banks.

Mr. PHELAN. Do I understand that the object of the Senator's amendment is to reimburse, as it were, the banks for the loss in deposits, so that there will be an even balance, and there will be actually no transfer of funds?

Mr. WEEKS. It helps to bring about that purpose, which is desirable.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I can perhaps give him a little information upon this subject, because it was brought to my attention yesterday in New York. A gentleman there connected with one of the trust companies said that his company would be much more likely to invest $10,000,000 in these bonds if the money, instead of being drawn out by the Government or taken across the street to a national bank, were permitted to remain there until the Government actually needed it; and that would be done in the absence of some provision like this, because under the present law the Secretary has no power to select any other than a national bank for deposit. He thought and I think that it will expedite and encourage the sale of the bonds. Of course, the money can remain in the vaults of the purchaser only so long as the Government does not need it. The purpose is to prevent the shifting of that money from a State bank to a National bank right across the street.

Mr. PHELAN. Let me add that the amendment that has just been proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] provides that deposits shall only be made in banks and trust companies where security is given in United States and other acceptable bonds. Now, where the trust company or bank buys the new issue, it can immediately use the new issue for security.

Mr. THOMAS. That may be.

Mr. PHELAN. But where the customer buys the bank can not call upon the customer for his security. So large is this transaction, beyond all previous precedent, that there will be a great deal of money which can not be deposited in the banks, because the banks have not the security to offer, in case this amendment prevails.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, the Senator realizes that this is the most enormous bond issue ever put out by this or any other country, and in all probability it will require extraordinary methods in order to properly and satisfactorily and speedily dispose of them. If the Senator and I were fortunate enough to own a trust company having the money, certainly we would be more apt to buy Government bonds, if the proceeds were left with us until the authorities needed it than if they were sent across the street to our rivals.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, just a word. I heard what my colleague [Mr. REED] said, and I approve it. I am such an ardent advocate and supporter of the reserve bank system that I want to do everything I can to strengthen it. We have here a great proposition involving the greatest financial transactions in our history, and it is proposed to let in upon equal footing banks and trust companies that do not see proper for their own reasons to enter into the reserve bank system, a privilege they could have if they cared to avail themselves of it, and which they should for patriotic reasons avail themselves of, to give them in this great emergency, where billions of dollars are to be deposited for the use of the people of the country, they are to be let in upon terms of equality with the member banks of the reserve system.

Here is the greatest chance the reserve bank system has ever had to demonstrate and exemplify its usefulness and to make its potency felt. Member banks are scattered broadcast over the land; they are in every neighborhood, and why should they not be given the advantage of this opportunity, and why should not the example of this opportunity be presented to all the banks of the country now? Why should not our great bank system be encouraged and strengthened in this way? I think my colleague has a correct view of the situation.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Missouri that in my judgment the banks to come forward with the greatest measure of patriotism in subscribing for this loan would be the country banks organized under State charters. It is hardly to be debated, as far as my own State is concerned, that the savings banks and trust companies of the State could probably furnish ten times as many subscriptions to this loan as the national banks. I may be wrong in my estimate, but it would be at least several times over. Those banks ought to be encouraged as much as is practicable at this time. If a trust company in any of the States loans the Government a hundred thousand dollars and if they allow the Government bonds to which they subscribe to remain as collateral, I see no reason why that money ought not to remain with the trust companies and savings banks until the Government has occasion to use it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill, as I understand it, is to raise a great loan of five billion. The bill is not constructed to benefit the Federal reserve banks or any other banks. The object is to make successful this great loan, and we want to open the doors to every financial institution of good standing to come forward and take a part of the loan.

I think this would encourage a great many great financial institutions and trust companies to come forward and join in this loan, and I think we ought to encourage them all. We shall need all the financial institutions of the country to enable us to float the loan at 3½ per cent, and I believe that it can be done.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a word. If this amendment is not adopted the result, no doubt, would be that there would be a shifting of the deposits in this country which might seriously interfere with business in the different sections of the country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the committee accepts the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is accepted.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, merely that there may not be a misunderstanding as to my position in making the statement I made a moment ago, I desire to add a few words. Of course, no one desires to make this attempt of the Government to float a very large loan a means of profit to particular banks. We all understand as well as the Senator from Massachusetts that what we are trying to do is to get money with which to meet the present urgent demands of the Government, and that all classes of citizens, all kinds of financial institutions, will be asked to invest in the securities of the Government, but when once that money has been secured the question comes as to its disposition.

The credit of the Government and the stability of our entire financial system rests to a very large degree upon the stability of the Federal Reserve Bank System which we created with such infinite care and from which we have hoped so much. Every bank and trust company of importance in the United States ought to have joined that system, and we hoped they would join that system; but many of them, in fact, nearly all State banks and trust companies, have seen fit to remain out of the system and to contribute nothing to its support, while at the same time in common with the national banks they received the benefit of the financial stability which that system has created.

It seemed to me, therefore, that we ought not to depart from the policy we have hitherto followed, namely, that the Government should at least encourage its own system by continuing to conduct its fiscal transactions through that system.

I make this statement because I do not want the question to be left as the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts seemed to leave it, namely, that those who had advocated an adherence to the present system were acting in the interest of some particular banks. Before we are through with these fiscal transactions I think we will find there is a great strain put upon the Federal Reserve System, and that it ought to be sustained in every possible way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEEKS. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 14, after the word "interest," strike out down to and including the word "eighteen," in line 15, and insert:

before the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government, the date of such termination to be fixed by a proclamation of the President of the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. I accept that amendment.

Mr. OWEN. Let it be read with the text so that we can understand it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read in connection with the text.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 14, after the word "interest," strike out the words "on or before December 31, 1918," and insert:

before the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government, the date of such termination to be fixed by a proclamation of the President of the United States,

So as to read:

SEC. 5. That any series of bonds issued under authority of sections 1 and 4 of this act may, under such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, be convertible into bonds bearing a higher rate of interest than the rate at which the same were issued if any subsequent series of bonds shall be issued at a higher rate of interest before the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government, the date of such termination to be fixed by a proclamation of the President of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEEKS. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 11, after the words "shall be," strike out down to and including the word "prescribe," in line 3, page 2, and insert:

issued in denominations of $50 and multiples thereof, as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine; they shall be convertible into bonds bearing a higher rate of interest if bonds carrying higher rates are issued during the present war; they shall mature serially in equal amounts annually from the date of issue to 30 years from the date of issue bearing interest, payable semiannually, not exceeding 3½ per cent per annum.

Mr. HUGHES. Does that apply to all bonds to be issued?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. REED. Where is it proposed that that shall go in the bill?

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 11, after the words "The bonds herein authorized shall be," strike out the words "in such form and subject to such terms and conditions of issue, conversion, redemption, maturities, payment, and rate and time of payment of interest, not exceeding 3½ per cent per annum, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe," and insert:

issued in denominations of $50 and multiples thereof, as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine; they shall be convertible into bonds bearing a higher rate of interest if bonds carrying higher rates are issued during the present war; they shall mature serially in equal amounts annually from the date of issue to 30 years from the date of issue bearing interest, payable semiannually, not exceeding 3½ per cent per annum.

Mr. WEEKS. Unless the chairman of the Committee on Finance is prepared to accept the amendment, I will discuss it briefly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am unable to accept the amendment.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, this amendment has three or four purposes. The bill as it is submitted to the Senate leaves to the Secretary of the Treasury all matters relating to the issuing of bonds, including their payment and other kindred matters. It is just as important, in my judgment, that when this Government issues indebtedness Congress should provide the manner of issuing it and the date of its termination as it is for an individual or for a corporation to do so. Of course the Secretary of the Treasury is given authority to provide the details of issuing this indebtedness, but it is the function of Congress, in my judgment, to stipulate the manner of issuing it.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in the finance bill which was passed by the Senate just before the 4th of March there was a provision for the renewal of $68,000,000 of Spanish War indebtedness. That indebtedness was 20 years old, and the provision required that it should be reissued for 50 years; in other words, those of our grandchildren who will be taxpayers at that time will be paying an indebtedness incurred 70 years before in the conduct of the Spanish War. At the same time there was a provision providing for the issuing of $226,000,000 of Panama Canal bonds for 50 years.

The indebtedness which is to be incurred for the payment of the cost of this war should be paid within a reasonable time. I think a reasonable time is 20 years. My judgment is that we should raise through taxation the money necessary to conduct the civil affairs of the Government, to pay the interest on the public debt, and to pay about one-twentieth of the actual military cost of the war. If that were done, I do not believe that legitimate business would be embarrassed in any way, and it would impose on this generation all the cost of the war.

Now, what I am afraid of is that these bonds will be issued for a much longer time than 20 years—for 30 or 40 or 50 years. In my judgment, that is bad public policy, because within that time we may have to incur other similar indebtedness.

Then, my amendment provides that these bonds shall be issued in serial form. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to-night to discuss the details involved in issuing serial bonds. I did that about a month ago in this Chamber, and I think the discussion was such that those who listened to it were convinced of the fact that serial bonds can be sold as well or better than bonds all of which terminate at one time, and that the cost of such a loan to the maker of the loan is very materially less than it would be if there were a sinking fund provided or if the bonds were all to mature at one time.

I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate one statement which I think will be sufficient to indicate what I mean by that. Last year the city of New York made a sale of $40,000,000 50-year 4½ per cent sinking-fund bonds and $15,000,000 1 to 15 year 4½ per cent serial bonds. Mr. Alfred D. Chandler, who is an expert on this subject, states in relation to this transaction:

Such an issue of sinking-fund bonds will ultimately cost New York City $16,726,320 more than if issued in serial form, assuming that the sinking-fund earnings would for half a century average 3½ per cent, or $19,182,200 more if the sinking-fund earnings averaged 3 per cent, which is the basis of computation adopted by the State of New York.

If the $40,000,000 4½ per cent sinking-fund bonds were exchanged into serial bonds at an increase of ¼ per cent, or ½ per cent, or ¾ per cent, or even ⅛ per cent, the difference in favor of the serials would be for the 50 years as follows:

	Sinking fund, 3 per cent basis.	Sinking fund, 3½ per cent basis.
As serials at 4½ per cent	$19,182,200	$16,726,320
As serials at 4¾ per cent	18,057,200	15,451,320
As serials at 4½ per cent	16,632,200	14,176,320
As serials at 4⅛ per cent	15,357,200	12,901,320
As serials at 4¼ per cent	14,082,200	11,626,320

It will be seen that the least gain that the city could have made in that case by issuing serials would have been $11,626,320.

Mr. President, we are to issue $5,000,000,000 of bonds under the provisions of this bill. If they are issued in serial form, they will cost this Government tens of millions of dollars less before maturity than they would if issued under a sinking-fund plan or issued to mature at one time. I do not think that the majority is justified in imposing on this Government a cost so immeasurably greater than would be the cost if these bonds were issued in a scientific way.

Mr. STONE. Why does the Senator from Massachusetts say that "the majority" would impose?

Mr. WEEKS. I am speaking of the majority of the Senate, and I am, of course, referring to the Committee on Finance in this matter. The State of Massachusetts has adopted the serial system of issuing bonds in part, and the city of Boston is about to do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Massachusetts has referred to the Committee on Finance. I will state to the Senator that the members who were present in the committee were, as I understood, unanimously in favor of the provisions of the pending bill without reference to party.

Mr. WEEKS. I referred, Mr. President, to the Committee on Finance, but the committee did agree to the provision which is in the bill. I do not know that this matter was taken up by the committee or was given any consideration by the committee. I hope, however, the committee will be willing to listen to argument on the subject.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I do not suppose I am violating any of the proprieties by stating to the Senator from Massachusetts that the matter was discussed by the full committee. The suggestion was made, not only in the committee but in other places, that in the case of a large bond issue of this character it might be necessary to issue some bonds not of a serial nature; in other words, that it might be necessary to issue bonds under all sorts of conditions. I think nearly everybody agrees with the Senator from Massachusetts with reference to the general desirability of serial bond issues; but at the same time the example of the State of Massachusetts can hardly be cited here with any great applicability, because the State of Massachusetts, or any other State, has a market for its bonds, while we may have to go into every kind of a market. We may have to sell bonds to people who do not desire serial bonds, but who desire to employ their money over long spaces of time.

Mr. WEEKS. Well, Mr. President, if the Committee on Finance had taken time enough to have summoned experts before them, as they should have done, to have gotten the advice of experts about the best method of issuing these bonds and of selling them, they would have learned that serial bonds will sell quite as well as bonds of any other form.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] to say that this matter was discussed by the Committee on Finance?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes, sir; I said that was my recollection.

Mr. GALLINGER. The matter may have been casually mentioned, but, though I was at the meeting when this bill was finally acted upon, I have no recollection of any such discussion.

Mr. HUGHES. Well, the Senator will not blame me for that, if I am correct about it, and I think I am. The matter was discussed, and, as I recollect, the suggestion was made that in some cases long-term bonds would be preferable to serial bonds. I think nearly every member of the committee is predisposed in favor of a serial bond where the situation would permit the flotation of a serial bond, and I think the committee understood that the Secretary of the Treasury is in favor of the serial-bond proposition rather than the long-term bond, and that he will issue the serial bonds if the situation will permit and to the extent that the situation will permit.

Mr. GALLINGER. My recollection is that, while there was a casual mention made of the matter, no real consideration was given to it by the committee.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. OWEN addressed the Chair.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield first to my colleague.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I merely desire to say that at the first meeting of the Committee on Finance, when the Secretary of the Treasury was present, this matter was brought up, and the Secretary then stated that there was provision in the bill—as there is—allowing him to issue serial bonds, but that he thought it was unwise to limit the issue to any one form; that it might be desirable to issue other forms; and, as I understood it, the committee left it as it was, to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. WEEKS. Well, Mr. President, I shall feel that a great injustice had been done the people if these bonds are issued in any other form than that of serial bonds or if they are issued for a long time, one which will carry this indebtedness to several succeeding generations; and if we are to judge by the past, we may naturally conclude that the Secretary of the Treasury will issue these bonds for as long a term as 50 years, for it was as the result of his recommendation that the refunding of Spanish War loan and the issuing of the Panama Canal bonds were provided to mature at the end of 50 years.

Mr. PHELAN. Sinking fund bonds or serial bonds?

Mr. WEEKS. Neither sinking fund nor serial bonds.

Mr. PHELAN. It is, as I understand, the practice of all Governments to issue bonds for a period, then to refund them, and not to redeem them. Is that not the practice?

Mr. WEEKS. It is not the up-to-date practice of any Government; and we might as well lead as to follow in such matters. I should like to ask the Senator from California what would happen to a business man—and he is a good business man—if he issued his personal note and renewed it several times without making any reduction?

Mr. PHELAN. That would imply that the borrower was immortal. The State is immortal; it has that advantage over the individual.

Mr. WEEKS. Such a person's credit would soon be pretty bad; and the credit of our Government ought to be considered as carefully as the credit of an individual.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the bill as drawn and as passed by the House of Representatives reposes very large discretion with reference to the issue of these bonds in the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President. It allows him to issue them "in such form and subject to such terms and conditions of issue, conversion, redemption, maturities, payment, and rate and time of payment of interest, not exceeding 3½ per cent per annum, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe."

Mr. REED. Does the Senator know whether such a power as that has ever been reposed in a public official by any other Government?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not able to answer the Senator that question. This was a subject of very prolonged discussion in another body; and I think, as a result of that discussion, it was decided that in this situation it was wise and prudent to vest the administration with these large powers with reference to the issue of these securities. If the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts prevails, all of this discretion will be taken away from the Secretary of the Treasury, and he will be compelled—for the amendment uses the word "shall"—to issue only serial bonds, to be paid one-twentieth every year for 20 years.

Mr. President, when the war closes, I think there will be great need for the use of the capital of this country. I think we are likely to have a very strenuous condition of rivalry and very feverish activity, requiring the use of the capital of the country. There will also be a large permanent increase in the expenses of the Government. We will have a much larger Navy, a much larger Army, and in many other directions the expenses of the Government will be enormously increased. To undertake, in view of those circumstances, to pay off this enormous indebtedness in 20 years, it seems to me would impose a very heavy burden upon the people of this country.

But, Mr. President, aside from those considerations, I think it would be very unwise not to permit the Secretary of the Treasury to take into consideration in the issuance of this large amount of bonds the conditions which may confront him. It may be that he could float serial bonds, falling due in from 1 to 20 years, at rates of interest which we have prescribed in the bill; but I think it very doubtful whether he would be able to float these bonds at that rate of interest, running for so short a length of time. I do not know myself, nor does he know, what will be the actual conditions of the market with which he will have to deal, but those conditions will be uncertain and fluctuating; they may change from day to day; and he must have discretion, unless he is to be hampered and embarrassed in the discharge of his duties in issuing these bonds, so as to meet the actual situation not only which will exist immediately upon the authority being conferred upon him, but which may exist from time to time as long as this war shall continue. The Secretary of the Treasury was before the committee. I have talked with him about this matter, and I know that he feels that the adoption of this amendment would very seriously handicap him with reference to floating these bonds.

Without undertaking to discuss the matter more fully at this late hour, I wish to say, Mr. President, that I earnestly hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts will not prevail.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I should like also to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to the fact that a considerable part of these securities are to be used for extending credit to those nations with whom we are now associated in the conduct of the war, and that those nations which have to put up securities of a like character might also find it embarrassing to be confined within the restrictions of the proposed amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator very much for that suggestion. It strengthens enormously the general suggestion that I have made. We are issuing bonds which we propose to sell and to take the proceeds to buy the bonds of foreign Governments engaged in fighting our enemy. It is provided in the bill that the bonds which we are to take from the foreign Governments shall be practically identical in terms and conditions and times of payment with our bonds; so that $3,000,000,000 of these bonds that we are to take from our allies would have to be serial bonds payable within 20 years. Considering the financial conditions which exist in those countries, with the large issue of bonds that they have already put out on their own account in the prosecution of the war, it seems to me that we might find it very embarrassing as affecting these Governments to issue short-term bonds as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I am not surprised that the Senator from North Carolina seized the suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] with enthusiasm, because it is about the only argument which could be made against issuing serial bonds. Of course, however, I did not intend to include the bonds which are to issue against the loans which we are to make to foreign countries in the proposition which I have made, but simply the bonds which we are to issue for our own uses.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when Mr. GOFF's name was called). I desire to state that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], but I have assurance that I am released from that pair on any vote on the pending bond measure. Therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. HUSTING's name was called). I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] on official business.

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. As he is absent from the Chamber, I will refrain from voting. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. LANE's name was called). I desire to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] is detained from the Chamber on account of illness.

Mr. SWANSON (when Mr. MARTIN's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MARTIN] is detained from the Senate on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). My colleague [Mr. SMITH] is absent. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]; but if my colleague were here he would vote "yea," the same as the Senator from Missouri has voted.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. TILLMAN's name was called). I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is unavoidably detained; and he asks me to ask the Senate for indefinite leave of absence for him, which I will do later. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the negative). Noticing that my general pair, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is absent, I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the affirmative). To remove any doubt, I will transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] and let my vote stand.

Mr. STONE. Being a member of the Committee on Finance, I prefer not to vote upon this amendment.

The roll call resulted—yeas 40, nays 40, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] the yeas are 40 and the nays are 40. Without the vote of the Vice President, the amendment is lost. As the Vice President knows nothing about it, he refuses to vote.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment on page 2, line 8, to which I referred a short time ago. It is to strike out, on line 8, the words "authority of any State" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "any State or local taxing authority." The text exempts these bonds from Federal or State taxation. The effect of this amendment is simply to broaden it and make it a little clearer and to exempt them from taxation by any Federal, State, or local taxing authority.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not think we have gone quite that far in any of our exemptions. We have hardly extended it to municipalities and local organizations.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, that is the exact provision that was contained in the farm-loan act.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall not oppose the amendment, Mr. President, saying to the Senator that I will take it up in conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 8, it is proposed to strike out the words "authority of any State" and to insert "any State or local taxing authority."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, and if I may have the attention of the chairman of the committee, if that amendment is adopted, it will be necessary to make a like amendment to the amendment proposed by the committee which appears upon page 7; but I feel sure that there is no occasion for the amendment. If any local authority acts in the matter, it must of necessity derive its authority to act from the State, so that it would be by the authority of the State in any event.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think the construction which the Senator from Montana places upon this language is correct; but we have adopted that language in connection with other bond issues, and it seems to me it is simply in the interest of clearness to adopt it.

Mr. PENROSE. Let it go to conference, anyhow, and we will fix it.

Mr. POMERENE. I am entirely content to have that course taken.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the suggestion that I made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. Now, Mr. President, I offer the same amendment on page 7, as applied to certificates of indebtedness. On page 7, line 8, I move to strike out the words "authority of any State" and to substitute therefor "by any State or local taxing authority."

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be necessary to reconsider the vote by which the amendment at that point was adopted.

Mr. POMERENE. I move to reconsider the vote, then, by which the amendment was adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to reconsider the vote by which the amendment at this point was adopted.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The section has been amended before this. The amendment the Senator offers is not to the text as it stands.

Mr. POMERENE. I offer it as an amendment to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The section was amended before on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. Where does this go in?

The SECRETARY. On page 7, lines 8 and 9, the words "except estate and inheritance taxes" were stricken out, and, on line 7, after the word "taxation," the words "except estate or inheritance taxes" were inserted, so as to read:

shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxes, except estate or inheritance taxes imposed by authority of the United States or its possessions, or by authority of any State.

Mr. POMERENE. "Or local taxing authority."

The SECRETARY. Then it is proposed to insert, after the word "State," the words "or local taxing authority."

Mr. SIMMONS. "Of a State."

The SECRETARY. So as to read, "any State or local taxing authority."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I move now, on page 2, lines 8 and 9, to strike out the words "except estate or inheritance taxes," and to insert those same words on line 7, after the word "taxation."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, lines 8 and 9, it is proposed to strike out "except estate or inheritance taxes" and to insert, after the word "taxation," in line 7, the words "except estate or inheriance taxes."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That in addition to the reports now required by law, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, on the first Monday in December, 1917, and annually thereafter, transmit to Congress a detailed statement of all expenditures under this act.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection at all to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to say just a word in regard to the bill. I will detain the Senate for only a moment. I want to do this more for the RECORD than for anything else, because, in my judgment, section 5 ought to be omitted from the bill; and I do not, in voting for the bill, want it to be understood that I favor the principle that is embodied in section 5, by which it is provided that if any other bonds are issued during the war at a higher rate of interest, that fact shall have the effect of increasing the interest on the bonds that are issued under his bill.

It seems to me that that is bad legislation. It is not fair to the Government. Knowing that an amendment to strike it out would not prevail, and would only take up the time of the Senate, I simply wanted to let the RECORD show that while I favor the bill, and intend to vote for it, I do not want my vote to be construed as favoring the principle contained in section 5.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 11, after the words "shall be," it is proposed to strike out down to and including the word "prescribe," in line 3, page 2, and to insert:

issued in denominations of $50 and multiples thereof as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine; they shall be convertible into bonds bearing a higher rate of interest if bonds carrying higher rates are issued during the present war; they shall mature serially in equal amounts annually from the date of issue to 30 years from the date of issue, bearing interest payable semiannually not exceeding 3½ per cent per annum.

Mr. WEEKS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. In his absence, I refrain from voting.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Announcing my general pair and its transfer as on the previous roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I withhold my vote. I would vote "yea" if not paired.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 37, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—37.

Borah	France	Lodge	Smoot
Brady	Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Sutherland
Brandegee	Gallinger	McLean	Thomas
Calder	Gronna	Nelson	Townsend
Colt	Hale	New	Wadsworth

NOT VOTING—17.

Bankhead	Hollis	Newlands	Underwood

So Mr. WEEKS's amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARDWICK (when Mr. BANKHEAD's name was called). I wish to state that the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] are necessarily absent, and that if present both Senators would vote for the bill.

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). It having been stated that the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], with whom I have a general pair, would vote for the bill if present, I am free to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when Mr. HOLLIS's name was called). I desire to state that the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] is absent on necessary business from the Senate Chamber, and if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. HUSTING's name was called). I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] on official business of the Senate, and that if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. LANE's name was called). I desire to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] is detained from the Chamber on account of illness. I am informed that if present he would "yea."

Mr. SWANSON (when Mr. MARTIN's name was called). I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. MARTIN] is detained from the Senate on account of sickness in his family, and that if he were here he would vote "yea."

Mr. PITTMAN (when Mr. NEWLANDS's name was called). The senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I am informed by him that if he were present he would vote "yea." I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I received a telegram from the Senator stating that if he were present he would vote for the bill. I therefore feel at liberty to vote, and I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). If my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I am informed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] that if present he would vote "yea." I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. TILLMAN's name was called). I am authorized to announce that the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is detained by illness, and were he present he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness. I am told that he would vote "yea" if present. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to announce that if the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] were present he would vote for the bill.

The result was announced—yeas 84, nays 0, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes."

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. STONE, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. LODGE conferees on the part of the Senate.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

Mr. OVERMAN. From the Committee on the Judiciary, I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes. I give notice that I shall call up the bill for consideration to-morrow.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 18, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 18, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee that in Thy providence and grace the light of Thy truth shines upon every problem of human life. Thou hast not left us in the darkness with reference to the final issue. There is no want to them that fear Thee. We pray that Thou wilt give to us the gracious influence of Thy presence this day that every thought may be brought into subjection to Thy will and that by perfect soul mastery we may have power to overcome and, having done all in Thy name, to stand. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. HITCHCOCK and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2762) to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. KITCHIN, Mr. RAINEY, Mr. DIXON, Mr. FORDNEY, and Mr. GARDNER managers at the conference on the part of the House.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MYERS. I send to the desk a telegram from the Rotary Club of Great Falls, Mont., in favor of conscription. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD with the names of the committee attached thereto.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GREAT FALLS, MONT., April 16, 1917.

Hon. HENRY L. MYERS,
Washington, D. C.:

Rotary Club of Great Falls to-day passed unanimously following resolution:

"Whereas the critical condition which confronts our Nation has made it necessary to raise a large army; and

"Whereas the members of this club believe that compulsory military service is the only fair, just, and practicable solution of the problem of raising an army: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Great Falls Rotary Club stands squarely behind President Wilson in his request for a system of conscription for the Nation, and we urge the Members of the Montana delegation in Congress to vote for a compulsory-service measure and to do all in their power to bring about the passage of such legislation as soon as possible."

H. P. RABAN,
J. R. ROBBINS,
SCOTT B. LEAVITT,
Committee.

Mr. CURTIS presented a petition of sundry citizens of Hays, Kans., pledging support to the President, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of Col. R. W. Mitchell, proposing a plan for the increased production of foodstuffs, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. ASHURST. I have a copy of a declaration of policy in the administration of Indian affairs promulgated by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, April 17, 1917.

DECLARATION OF POLICY IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

During the past four years the efforts of the administration of Indian affairs have been largely concentrated on the following fundamental activities: The betterment of health conditions of Indians, the suppression of the liquor traffic among them, the improvement of their industrial conditions, the further development of vocational training in their schools, and the protection of the Indians' property. Rapid progress has been made along all these lines, and the work thus reorganized and revitalized will go on with increased energy. With these activities and accomplishments well under way, we are now ready to take the next step in our administrative program.

The time has come for discontinuing guardianship of all competent Indians and giving even closer attention to the incompetent that they may more speedily achieve competency.

Broadly speaking, a policy of greater liberalism will henceforth prevail in Indian administration to the end that every Indian, as soon as he has been determined to be as competent to transact his own business as the average white man, shall be given full control of his property and have all his lands and moneys turned over to him, after which he will no longer be a ward of the Government.

Pursuant to this policy the following rules shall be observed:

1. Patents in fee: To all able-bodied adult Indians of less than one-half Indian blood there will be given, as far as may be under the law, full and complete control of all their property. Patents in fee shall be issued to all adult Indians of one-half or more Indian blood who may, after careful investigation, be found competent, provided, that where deemed advisable patents in fee shall be withheld for not to exceed 40 acres as a home.

Indian students, when they are 21 years of age or over, who complete the full course of instruction in the Government schools, receive diplomas, and have demonstrated competency will be so declared.

2. Sale of lands: A liberal ruling will be adopted in the matter of passing upon applications for the sale of inherited Indian lands where the applicants retain other lands and the proceeds are to be used to improve the homesteads or for other equally good purposes. A more liberal ruling than has hitherto prevailed will hereafter be followed with regard to the applications of noncompetent Indians for the sale of their lands where they are old and feeble and need the proceeds for their support.

3. Certificates of competency: The rules which are made to apply in the granting of patents in fee and the sale of lands will be made equally applicable in the matter of issuing certificates of competency.

4. Individual Indian moneys: Indians will be given unrestricted control of all their individual Indian moneys upon issuance of patents in fee or certificates of competency. Strict limitations will not be placed upon the use of funds of the old, the indigent, and the invalid.

5. Pro rata share—Trust funds: As speedily as possible their pro rata shares in tribal trust or other funds shall be paid to all Indians who have been declared competent, unless the legal status of such funds prevents. Where practicable the pro rata shares of incompetent Indians will be withdrawn from the Treasury and placed in banks to their individual credit.

6. Elimination of ineligible pupils from the Government Indian schools: In many of our boarding schools Indian children are being educated at Government expense whose parents are amply able to pay for their education and have public-school facilities at or near their homes. Such children shall not hereafter be enrolled in Government Indian schools supported by gratuity appropriations, except on payment of actual per capita cost and transportation.

These rules are hereby made effective, and all Indian Bureau administrative officers at Washington and in the field will be governed accordingly.

This is a new and far-reaching declaration of policy. It means the dawn of a new era in Indian administration. It means that the competent Indian will no longer be treated as half ward and half citizen. It means reduced appropriations by the Government and more self-respect and independence for the Indian. It means the ultimate absorption of the Indian race into the body politic of the Nation. It means, in short, the beginning of the end of the Indian problem.

In carrying out this policy I cherish the hope that all real friends of the Indian race will lend their aid and hearty cooperation.

CATO SELLS, Commissioner.

Approved:

FRANKLIN K. LANE, Secretary.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have a copy of a resolution adopted at a mass meeting of citizens at Bellingham, Wash. I am going to ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that I make this request only because the resolutions from various States are being printed in the RECORD, and, of course, if these resolutions are not printed the people will wonder why not. I really think we ought not to print so many of these things in the RECORD, but when they appear from one State they are necessarily forced into the RECORD from another.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECLARATION OF PRINCIPLES.

The people of Bellingham in mass meeting assembled hereby declare—

"That we stand for liberty, humanity, and justice, as expressed in the Constitution and laws of the great self-governing nations of the world.

"That we recognize in the battle of England, France, Belgium, Italy, Russia, and their allies the battle of democracy against autocracy, of individual freedom against centralized tyranny. We realize that President Wilson has done everything possible except sacrifice the Nation's honor to keep us out of war, and now that war has come it is due to the wanton aggression of the Imperial German Government.

"Therefore, as we read the long list of our dead, of the sunken ships, the hospital and relief ships torpedoed, the crews massacred in open boats, the violation of all the laws of civilized warfare, we commend our President and Congress for their action in joining with the allies in defense of civilization. We ask for universal service and pledge our lives and fortunes to the successful conduct of this righteous war."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to emphasize what has just been said by the Senator from Washington in relation to filling the RECORD with telegrams, private letters, and resolutions of all sorts.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And private letters.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; private letters. I believe, Mr. President, that the Senate, as a whole, ought to restrict this practice just as much as it is possible to do, particularly under the paper conditions existing to-day.

I called attention the other day to the fact that it is the hardest thing in the world for the Government Printing Office to secure paper enough to supply the absolute necessities of the Government. I had prepared the other day a statement showing the cost of the requests that have been made by Senators and sent to the Committee on Printing, and the amount of the requests in the Sixty-fourth Congress, if they had all been complied with, would be $1,293,116.52. That is for just the printing that has been requested, where the requests were referred to the Committee on Printing. I have not the figures to show what the printing in the RECORD costs the Government, where the requests are not sent to the Committee on Printing.

I again request Senators not to ask that the RECORD be encumbered with private letters and private telegrams and resolutions of all sorts, at least, until conditions in the paper market are better than they are to-day.

I sincerely hope that the suggestion offered by the Senator from Washington this morning will be heeded by the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not often intrude myself upon occasions of this kind, but I heartily indorse what the Senator from Utah has said and what the Senator from Washington has suggested. I referred to this matter the other day, when the Senator from Mississippi made an error in picking up the wrong papers and dumped them in the Senate here and they were published in the RECORD.

It is a poor way for a Senator to record his appearance on an important question. It would be much better if he would answer his correspondence through the ordinary channels of the mail and rely on such ability as he may possess at the proper time to present his views without having published in the RECORD inconsequential telegrams from obscure individuals or mass meetings held here and there passing resolutions. The RECORD some mornings looks more like the copy book of an office of the Western Union Telegraph Co. than it looks like the dignified record of the proceedings of the Congress of the United States.

This practice, Mr. President, has been carried in the last few weeks to an extreme which has made it ridiculous and absurd, and it hampers the use of the RECORD by obscuring the really good matter by a vast mass of unimportant material which never should find place there. It is difficult for me to imagine that Senators, men having the capacity to get elected to this body, can so far forget their positions as to resort to such puerile methods.

I happen to represent, Mr. President, a State of nearly 9,000,000 inhabitants, equal to 20 States in parts of the country, and I do not believe in 20 years' service in this body I have inserted two telegrams. Yet it is needless for me to say that I have several thousand a week, many of them entitled to much greater consideration than any of those which appear in print. I receive scores and hundreds of resolutions passed by mass meetings for all conceivable purposes, but I refrain, out of a sense of good taste and propriety, from encumbering the RECORD with them. I take pains to acknowledge them all through the mail and through a letter, and not at the expense of the public in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

It seems, Mr. President, that the Members of this body might well pause and reflect on the viciousness of this practice and stop it as far as possible.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I shall premise what I shall ask unanimous consent to have done by saying that I heartily concur in what the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Pennsylvania have so well said. We are encumbering the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with a great deal of very interesting literature in the shape of private telegrams and letters, memorials and resolutions, from patriotic bodies that are never read here, and none of those who have passed the resolutions probably ever receive a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, except as those who have the printing done send it to them.

There are some exceptions to the rule that ought to govern us or, in fact, that ought to be included in the rule. I refer to the dignified resolutions of a State legislature, the petition of the people of the State to the Congress of the United States, which very properly are printed in the RECORD.

There are many instances in which I never make an objection, and I hope none ever will be made, in the case of addresses delivered by Members of this body at other places on great pending questions and to prevent probably, whether it would or not, the repetition on the floor. In those instances that is usually accorded.

Under this title there has fallen under my observation an address delivered on the one hundred and seventy-fourth anniversary of the birth of Thomas Jefferson by a Member of this body, Mr. PITTMAN, of the State of Nevada. It breathes a patriotic sentiment and gives the history of the causes that led up to the war with such clearness that I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD, promising the Senate that hereafter I shall intrude myself very seldom with any such requests.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The address referred to is as follows:

Senator PITTMAN said:

"Mr. Toastmaster and fellow citizens, I appreciate the honor of being invited to address this great forum upon the occasion of the patriotic celebration of the birthday of the great patron saint of democracy. I am deeply grateful that I am permitted through your courtesy to speak frankly, if not fully, with regard to our dangers and our duty.

"FIGHT FOR PRINCIPLE.

"In this moment of action we hear too much of the horrors of war and the value of life and too little of the misery of political slavery and the priceless blessings of justice, liberty, and equality. I fear lest we forget how and by what sacrifices our forefathers won and established the benign principles of democracy and our sacred duty to maintain these principles with our lives.

"The settlement of our country originated in the oppressions of autocracy and the birth of our Nation was conceived in the blood of martyrs and patriots, fearlessly and freely given that you and I might live in social and political equality under the constitutional guaranty of the freedom of speech, the privilege to worship our God as we see fit, and the right to rule ourselves.

"The fight that we face to-day, as grave as it may be, is not to be compared with the heroic struggle made by our forefathers for the natural rights of a free people. Their patriotism, self-sacrifice, and martyrdom not only secured the happiness we now enjoy but set an example to the liberty-loving people of the world that has resulted in the democratization of nearly every government on earth, and it is now up to us to make the job complete.

"God has been with us in every fight for liberty, and now in the darkest hours God will not desert us. In 1776, that the principles of democracy might be proclaimed and instituted in the world, He gave us Thomas Jefferson. In 1860, that our Union might be preserved, He raised from among the people Abraham Lincoln; and to-day, in the bewilderment of a world war, the duration of which no man can foresee, when the fate of humanity hangs in the balance and the dread darkness of the hour strikes fear to the soul, in His divine wisdom and mercy He has granted unto us and the cause of humanity the invincible leadership of Woodrow Wilson.

"CAUSE FOR WAR.

"Fellow citizens, our cause is just. Germany has for over two years murdered our citizens upon the high seas—men, women, and children—in the most stealthy, violent, and barbarous manner, in admitted violation of the universally recognized laws of nations and the dictates of humanity. Her only miserable excuse for these brutal crimes against an innocent people with whom her people were living in peace was her so-called law of necessity. There is no law of God or man that justifies the murder of innocent and peaceful people. Our people had a moral and a legal right to travel upon the high seas; no nation had the legal right to prevent it or to object; it is a right that all other people have enjoyed during modern times; it is a right that Germany has always demanded and indulged to the fullest extent. Nor has she permitted this right to be curtailed during the wars of other nations. The necessities of charity, humanity, and the exigencies of the times require that people travel upon the high seas.

"But why waste time in proving a right that is admitted by our enemy and which she solemnly promised upon the occasion of the sinking of the Sussex to observe and respect? And yet, after these full admissions and solemn promises, on the 31st day of January, 1917, she notified us that she will not only continue her ruthless warfare of murder against peaceful people, but that they will be slaughtered without notice, even upon a peaceful American vessel flying the American flag destined for a neutral port, if such vessel dares to go upon that portion of ocean forbidden by the German Government. In effect, the Prussian autocrat peremptorily ordered the great American Nation to get off the ocean. This is but the forerunner of the demand, should Prussianism prevail in the pending conflict, that the American Government get off the earth.

"SURRENDER OF RIGHTS.

"Is there a citizen in this country who is so cowardly or so unpatriotic who would have had the President humble the great democracy that he represents at the feet of the Prussian autocracy by admitting that our protestations against the crimes committed against our people on the high seas were but empty words, and that our warning to the German Government that we would protect the lives of our people against brutal murder was but the cowardly bluff of a nation not only unable to maintain but unworthy of the honor and privilege of self-government?

"And if we had surrendered this right where would we stop in our flight? Would we surrender the right of American citizens to receive the protection of the laws of every country wherever they may be? Would we stand to see our citizens murdered and their property confiscated in every foreign country in violation of the laws of every civilized nation because, perchance, the defending of such right might involve us in war and cost the loss of human life? And yet, if we surrendered the first right by reason of fear, it is certain that the other rights of American citizens would be treated with contempt and violated at will. No people who were afraid to die for their rights ever long retained them. Whenever the time comes that Americans will submit to the violation of their rights anywhere on earth through fear of a tyrannical military autocracy, then we will witness our Nation decay to its inevitable doom; we will behold the degeneracy of our people and see the fire of democracy, which was lighted in this country and which flashed across the world illuminating the darkest spots, smoulder and die. Fellow citizens, I believe that we have a higher duty on earth to perform than to live and fatten and die in contemptuous isolation within the limited area that may be allotted to us by the autocrats of the world.

"PEACE.

"The enemies of our liberties in this country, intentionally or unintentionally, hysterically cry out 'Let us keep out of war; let us appoint a joint commission of conciliators of the neutral nations; let us intervene and offer our services to bring about peace; let us submit the question to the American people.'

"Everyone wanted to keep out of war. No more intelligent, patriotic, or human effort was ever made to this end in the face of the most intense opposition and under the most trying circumstances than was made by the most patient, diplomatic, and peace-loving man that ever lived, our own President, Woodrow Wilson. In the early stages of the war he offered his services in the interest of peace; he exerted a forbearance in the face of wrongs that few men could have sustained; he called upon the neutral nations of the world, and on their behalf and on behalf of our own country urged the warring powers to state a basis upon which terms of peace might be considered. And all of these efforts failed, failed utterly, because one of the great groups of warring powers stated that there was no contest that was subject to arbitration; that there was no territory involved; that there was no dispute as to the right of nations; that there was nothing that could be given or accepted; that there was a sole question as to whether the world should be dominated by Prussianism or governed by democracy, and that such question was not one that could be determined through negotiations or by arbitration. Even then, so great was the longing of our President for peace that through the breaking off of diplomatic relations with the German Government he gave a last warning in the hope that they would be brought to the realization of their illegal and brutal acts and would desist. It was all in vain, and it must appear to any thinking man that further efforts are not only hopeless but are dangerous to the security of our own Government. What agreement could we obtain from a power that instituted the war for the purpose of dominating the world except to submit to such domination? What could we expect from any peace agreement with a government which treats a sacred treaty as a 'scrap of paper'? What better guarantee would we have with regard to the word of the German Government to-day than had the unfortunate Belgian Government?

"ANSWER TO MOTHERS AND PACIFISTS.

"There is no remedy against a confirmed murderer except death, and there is no security against militant autocracy except extermination. Our heartstrings are torn by the pitiful appeal of the loving mothers that we keep their boys out of war. You and I do not possess the deep affections of these mothers; we can not even imagine the sufferings they endure in every war. I know that they have always been the greatest sufferers and borne the greatest burdens of war, and that they will be the greatest sufferers and bear the greatest burdens of this war. I wish with all of my soul that it were within our power to alleviate their grief and lift their burdens, and I frankly confess that I would have been willing to long stand the insults and contempt of the Prussian autocracy if I had not felt that staying out of this war would but have cast us into a greater war. And to the sincere pacifist let me say that in your supposed isolation and security from this great war you are but having a dream. Let Germany defeat Russia to-morrow, and the day after to-morrow it is our turn. While we glory in the great democracy of Russia, while we look forward with the greatest hope to the building up there of a great democractic government, we can not but have fear that some of her people may not understand this great opportunity. We can not but have a fear that before they grasp firmly the reins of government there may be some other disturbance that will break up the discipline of the Russian Army. If that discipline is once broken, then Russia is gone and autocracy will again be placed in control of that country, an autocracy that will be obedient to Prussianism. If, unfortunately, that thing should happen, and it is possible, then Germany would rule Continental Europe. Germany would have the navies of Continental Europe, and Germany ruling Europe, with the navies of Europe, would have no trouble in conquering the countries on our north and on our south; and then, instead of having to maintain a standing Army of 300,000 or 400,000 men, we would be compelled to have a standing Army of 15,000,000 men. There will be no peace on earth until the Hohenzollerns are somewhere in another place.

"OUR DUTY.

"Those are the facts and possibilities you face. It were better that we lose a few of our men now rather than millions of them later on. It is preferable to have a few months of war now in cooperation with the allies than to have years of war later, alone and unassisted. Now is the time to strike, now is the time to act—not to act in a hesitating manner, not act in a niggardly way, but to act with all the great force of the Government, a power that no nation or no group of nations on earth could ever overcome. I hope to God, when that power is shown to them, that the German people who have so long been misruled by Prussianism, the German people who have never been told the conditions, the German people who have been taught by the Prussians that victory is sure, will awake and will see that the defeat of Prussianism is inevitable, and that they will rise in their new understanding and in their patriotism and follow the example of the Russian people by establishing a democractic government that the allies and this country can and will treat with.

"We have no war against the German people. The minute that Prussianism is stamped out in Germany, whether it is stamped out by us or by the German people themselves, all those countries who are now warring against the Prussian autocracy will most gladly meet the new Government halfway—yes; meet them more than halfway—and not only sign a treaty of peace with them, and not only help to build up a great democracy for Germany, but they will do everything in their power to alleviate the awful suffering in that unhappy country. To-day it is in the power of this Government to stamp out Prussianism, autocracy, and absolute monarchy throughout the whole world and thereby make peace without war a possibility; and we pray God that the opportunity be accepted by the American people in the spirit that gave birth to our own glorious freedom.

"The American people must awake to the seriousness of the situation; they must understand that we are now in a war for our national existence; that we are in a war that will neither make us the subjects, the slaves, of a despotic, cruel, military autocracy, or confirm democracy to our people and to the world for generations to come.

"It is too late to wrangle over means and methods; it is no time to decide whether we will fight them on the high seas or on the land or whether we will fight them upon American soil or upon French or Russian soil. We have now but one thing to determine, and we want to determine it with all the energy and force of the American people, and that is that we will fight them on the seas; we will fight them on American soil; we will fight them on French soil and Russian soil, or wherever they may be, until Prussianism is crushed out of existence and the flag of democracy floats throughout the world. In this dire extremity it is not how we will lick them, but that we will lick them; it is not where we will lick them, but that we will lick them everywhere; it is not what it will cost us either in treasure or in human life, but that the cost to the despotic, murderous, militant Government shall be so great and its defeat so overwhelming that never again will a despotic monarch trample with impunity upon the rights of free people.

"BACK THE PRESIDENT.

"The people of our country have been consulted, and they have spoken in no uncertain terms. Through the legislatures of every State they approved the President's course and have pledged their lives and property to their country. The people of the country approved the President's efforts for peace, and to-day every true American citizen, without regard to party, descent, or creed, stands loyally with him in his determination to protect the laws of humanity, the liberties of our people, and the honor of our Government. In this great cause there is no party, and there should be no party talk. It is the cause of America, and no man could better typify and represent that cause than Woodrow Wilson.

"There has been a coalition of all our people, and that coalition confidently indorses and follows the leadership of our President. He is to-day a world figure. He holds the admiration, respect, and confidence of the statesmen of all nations. The world looks to him to play the great part in the termination of the present unfortunate conflict and the establishment of a just and lasting peace. He has been great in peace and he will be superb in war.

"Oh, fellow citizens, even in the midst of calamity and sorrow we should be forgiven if our hearts swell with pride in contemplation of the supremacy of our people and the glory of our Nation. The sorrow that we will suffer will be but as a grain of sand upon the seashore to the happiness we will feel when victory is brought to democracy and merciful peace to the victor and the conquered alike through the efforts and sacrifices of a God-fearing and peace-loving people, marching ever onward under the Stars and Stripes to the inspiring strains of the 'Star-Spangled Banner.'"

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has been greatly embarrassed with all sorts of telegrams and communications; he hardly knew what to do with them; but he is going to announce the policy for the Chair. Hereafter citizens of the United States will not get their matter in the RECORD unless they present a petition to the Senate of the United States to do something or a protest against the Senate of the United States doing it, when they are sent to the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word in line with the subject taken up by the Senator from Utah, the Senator from Pennsylvania, and others. Personally I agree with what they have said. A more serious matter presents itself to my mind, however, in regard to inserting things in the RECORD, and that is a great deal of the matter gives information outside in regard to the doings and the conditions of the Government that should not be given.

I do not desire to take up the subject now, and I shall not do so. I only wish to call attention to the fact that the prepared contents of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this time should be scanned a great deal more closely by the Members of this body as to what it shall contain than it has ever been before on account of valuable information it might give to the German Government as to the condition of our Army and Navy, our plans, and various other matters.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to present a petition of citizens of Montrose County, Colo. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

I also present resolutions from the city of Salida adopted at a mass meeting held in that city at the opera house on Monday evening last. I ask that it also be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course I am not going to object to the request of the Senator to-day, but I think the time will come in a very few days when I shall exercise my right as a Senator and protest against such resolutions being further put in the RECORD. I will not do it to-day, I will say to the Senator, because he was not in the Chamber when the discussion occurred a little while ago.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that these petitions are not long and the people who have participated in these great meetings are intensely loyal. It seems to me it is a good thing to have a reasonable number of such petitions placed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. We have had a reasonable number already.

Mr. PENROSE. Suppose the 9,000,000 people of Pennsylvania, where they hold 100 meetings to 1 in the Senator's State, should dump them all into the Senate every morning; it would submerge the Senator's petitions so that they would hardly be heard of.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that there have been only three petitions or memorials presented by me from the entire State of Colorado.

Mr. PENROSE. A dozen other Senators from other States have presented them, and from 20 others the Senators had the good sense and good taste to have nothing printed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. These petitions are asked to be presented to the Senate, and it seems to me that it is wise to present them until notice is given that no more shall be presented, and then I shall try to conform to the rule that may be suggested.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator know how many persons were present at this meeting?

Mr. SHAFROTH. There were very large audiences. I know that.

Mr. PENROSE. How many—50 to 100?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; the entire population of the town and perhaps——

Mr. PENROSE. What is the population of the town?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Montrose is a town of 6,000 population.

Mr. PENROSE. They are pretty nearly qualified to have a public building.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Salida is a city of some five or six thousand population.

Mr. PENROSE. How many of these men have enlisted or indicated their intention to enlist?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have not any doubt that they will do their due share and that there will be fully as many enlistments as in Pennsylvania, in proportion to the population.

Mr. PENROSE. I venture the assertion and prediction that there will not be an enlistment from either town.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I did not intend to take any part in this discussion. I sympathize with the point of view of the Senator from Pennsylvania, but I want to resent that reflection upon the people of my State. There will be just as many enlistments, proportionately, in the State of Colorado as in any other State, as I know there will be in the State of Pennsylvania, where they have some public buildings. My impression is that when it comes to the size and population we are neither better nor worse than any of the great Commonwealths of the country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH]? The Chair hears none, and the resolutions will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolutions are as follows:

MONTROSE'S RESOLUTIONS OF PATRIOTISM.

Be it resolved by the citizens of Montrose County in convention assembled, That we recognize but one flag as our flag—the Stars and Stripes.

That we acknowledge allegiance to but one Government, which is represented by that flag—the United States of America.

That we recognize but one head of the Government, the man who now occupies the chair formerly occupied by George Washington and Abraham Lincoln—Woodrow Wilson.

That in our present national crisis and emergency, without thought of party affiliations, we unhesitatingly commend, sanction, and indorse the address of our President to Congress, made on the evening of April 2, and pledge to him our unqualified support in the maintaining and carrying out of these principles; and this we do as fully and determinedly as did our forefathers, who pledged their fortunes, their lives, and their sacred honor.

That we are residents of an agricultural community, and as such must not forget that food staples grown by the farmers are as necessary in war as are munitions, and that of all food staples wheat is predominant; that we urge upon all farmers the growing of a larger and increased acreage in wheat and food staples that can be used not only by our own armies and people but also shipped to the people of the allied nations who are fighting our battles; be it further

Resolved, That there is no room in this country for traitors or spies. Those who are not with us are against us. We demand strict respect and allegiance from all within our borders to our President, our Nation, and our flag.

Respectfully submitted.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW HAMPSHIRE STATE GRANGE, P. OF H.,
OFFICE OF MASTER,
Highland View Farm, Derry, N. H., March 29, 1917.

Hon. HENRY F. HOLLIS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am inclosing you a copy of some resolutions on preparedness. I do this that you may understand how the country people feel on this question.

Yours, truly,

WESLEY ADAMS.
DERRY, N. H., April 2, 1917.

WORTHY MASTER AND PATRONS: In the present national crisis every patriotic citizen will inquire, What is my duty? Manifestly it is every man's duty to do that which will most largely contribute to the success of the Nation in the defense of its honor and of the rights of its people.

There must be some to bear arms; there must be others to do less spectacular but equally important things.

The farm people of New Hampshire will in this critical moment look to their great organization for suggestions and advice. The grange in this State stands for patriotism, adequate and efficient equipment in men, money, and material to defend and enforce the honor and the rights of the American citizen.

Great armies are being raised and equipped; great naval forces are being enrolled, hundreds of thousands and even millions may be drawn in a few months from productive industry to military service.

The farmers of the State and Nation must provide for this vast military establishment and for the families left at home.

During the past three years the nations of the world have drawn heavily upon us for supplies of every description; enormous stores of food supplies ordinarily available have been removed. It is a patriotic duty possible to us all and no less important to our country that every farmer in the State increase to the limit the production of his land.

When the country needs them our farm people will subject themselves to the perils and privations of warfare. Until she needs them for that service they can none the less help by raising suitable equipment in food supplies to insure the success of her military operations and the sustenance of her people without unnecessary hardship.

This is service we are trained to do.

The grange tenders its good offices to the State and Nation for any service which it can render in the present situation. Its men are ready to fight when they can best serve their country by fighting, or to farm when they can best serve by farming; its women to bear, as women always have, their part and more in the burdens of this or any crisis that may arise.

We wish to serve where our service will contribute most to success.

WESLEY ADAMS,
GEO. R. DRAKE,
RICHARD PATTEE,
FRED A. ROGERS,
JOHN E. EASTMAN,
Executive Committee of the New Hampshire State Grange.

RESOLUTIONS OF NEW HAMPSHIRE KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS.

Whereas Congress and the President of the United States, in extraordinary session, have declared that a state of war exists between our country and the Imperial German Government; and

Whereas the state of war which now exists has been forced upon this country by the continued violation of the rights of humanity upon the high seas; and

Whereas our President has called upon the people of this Republic for their earnest support and cooperation in the suppression of this willful murder, and it is the sense of this body that only by unity of purpose and action may the desired purpose be accomplished: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the State Council of the Knights of Columbus of New Hampshire in special meeting convened at Nashua, April 12, 1917, do sincerely and solemnly pledge our unswerving loyalty and fidelity to our country and our flag, and promise to the President and to the governor of New Hampshire the unqualified support of the Knights of Columbus of New Hampshire to do whatever may be required of them to aid in bringing this conflict to a successful termination.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. SWANSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally with amendments and submitted reports thereon:

S. 1537. A bill to increase the age limit for persons appointed as officers in the Naval Reserve (Rept. No. 17);

S. 1797. A bill to authorize the President, in time of war or of national emergency, to requisition or take over ships, boats, and other water craft for the use of the Government (Rept. No. 19); and

S. 1845. A bill to authorize Peter Goelet Gerry to enter into a contract with the Secretary of the Navy, in behalf of the United States, for the use of the steam yacht Owera (Rept. No. 18).

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 1536. A bill to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," relative to the Fleet Naval Reserve (Rept. No. 14);

S. 1587. A bill to increase the number of midshipmen in the Naval Academy (Rept. No. 15); and

S. 1534. A bill to provide for the extension of minority enlistments in the naval service (Rept. No. 13).

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 1538) to authorize the detail of additional officers to the Hydrographic Office, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 16) thereon.

ENLISTMENTS FOR FOREIGN NATIONS.

Mr. CULBERSON. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 1802) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909, and I submit a report (No. 21) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, let the bill be read; but before it is read I desire to ask the Senator from Texas a question. Is this a unanimous report from the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. CULBERSON. It is a unanimous report from the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 10 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 10. Whoever, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, enlists, or enters himself, or hires or retains another person to enlist or enter himself, or to go beyond the limits or jurisdiction of the United States with intent to be enlisted or entered in the service of any foreign prince, State, colony, district, or people, as a soldier, or as a marine or seaman, on board of any vessel of war, letter of marque, or privateer, shall be fined not more than $1,000 and imprisoned not more than three years: Provided, That this section shall not apply to citizens or subjects of any country engaged in war with a country with which the United States is at war."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 9, after the word "retains," to insert "or solicits"; on page 2, line 3, after the words "apply to," to insert "the enlistment or entry of"; and in line 5, after the word "war," to insert "in the service of the country of which they are citizens or subjects."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the report accompanying the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

The report submitted this day by Mr. CULBERSON is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 21, 65th Cong., 1st sess.]

PERMITTING CERTAIN ENLISTMENTS UNDER FOREIGN NATIONS.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report (to accompany S. 1802):

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1802) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909, having considered the same, beg leave to report it back with amendments and recommend that it be so amended and passed.

Section 10 of the Criminal Code, which forbids enlistments in and recruiting for foreign military forces, is as follows:

"Whoever, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, enlists, or enters himself, or hires or retains another person to enlist or enter himself, or to go beyond the limits or jurisdiction of the United States with intent to be enlisted or entered in the service of any foreign prince, State, colony, district, or people, as a soldier, or as a marine or seaman, on board of any vessel of war, letter of marque, or privateer, shall be fined not more than $1,000 and imprisoned not more than three years."

The bill proposes to amend that section by adding to it (1) the words "or solicits" after the word "retains" and before the words "another person," and (2) the proviso at the end, which reads as follows, the amendment proposed by the committee being italicized:

"Provided, That this section shall not apply to the enlistment or entry of citizens or subjects of any country engaged in war with a country with which the United States is at war in the service of the country of which they are citizens or subjects."

The bill intends to permit the recruiting and enlisting within the United States of only those persons now or hereafter in this country who are citizens or subjects of a foreign Government which is warring against a nation with which the United States is similarly engaged. This is done by the proviso, which exempts from the operation of the existing statute the recruiting officers and the persons enlisting belonging to those definitely described countries. The law would still be applied to citizens of the United States and to all others in this country who are not citizens or subjects of a foreign nation which is at war with the same country against which the United States is fighting and would punish recruiting of them or enlistment by them. When the United States is at peace the proviso would, of course, be inoperative. The amendment to the proviso is proposed in the light of the view that each country so exempted should be specifically restricted to enlisting here only its own nationals.

The amendment, which adds the words "or solicits," will work so as to prevent, for instance, any foreign recruiting officer from merely soliciting for service under a foreign flag, though he do not hire or retain any citizen of the United States or other person whom he is not permitted under the proviso to enlist. Its application would be still broader when the United States is at peace.

The bill is much desired by the branches of the Government charged with the conduct of the war. Its enactment will furnish another way to help those countries now actively fighting our common enemy.

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING (S. DOC. NO. 10.)

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I report from the Committee on Printing a resolution for the printing of the manuscript entitled "Data Prepared by the Army War College Relating to Universal Military Training," the estimated cost of which is $214. There is a great demand for this document, and the pressure on individual members of the committee has been such that the committee at its last meeting instructed me to report this resolution and to ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 41), as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] on April 12, 1917, entitled "Data Prepared by the Army War College Relating to Universal Military Training," together with the accompanying letter from the Secretary of War, be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona a question. There is an appropriation in the sundry civil appropriation bill for the very purpose of printing such matter. Does the Senator from Arizona know whether or not this will duplicate the printing of the matter submitted?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I called attention in the committee to that provision in the appropriation bill, but it seems the object of that provision was to facilitate printing for the Army without coming back to Congress for authority to have the Government Printing Office do the work. We made a large appropriation, but it does not necessarily cover the printing of the document which I have now reported; and even if it did, the limited number of copies of Senate documents printed will not in any way fill the demands of the public for the particular information contained in the document I have presented.

Mr. SMOOT. With the statement made by the Senator from Arizona that this is not a departmental document, I have no objection to the request; but I will say to the Senator that if it were printed by the War Department as a departmental document I would certainly have serious objection to the printing of it as a public document.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. So would I.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I think I can give the information about that. My understanding is that it is not printed by the department and is merely a document to be printed by the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. With that understanding, I have no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That was my understanding or I would not have reported the resolution favorably.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield to me just for a moment, so that I may submit an amendment to a pending bill to be printed and lie on the table?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I offer an amendment to Senate bill 1796, to amend the Federal reserve act, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. According to the notice that the Chair gave yesterday, the rule is going to be enforced that a Senator having the floor can not be taken off his feet for the purpose of allowing another Senator to make a report or present morning business.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from Georgia was not aware of the notice or he would not have made the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule should either be observed or repealed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to ask the Senator from Arizona how many copies of the document does the resolution authorize to be printed?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The reguiar number. The Senator from Utah can give the information.

Mr. SMOOT. There will be 1,300 copies printed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I understand, they will be apportioned to each Senator—that is, each Senator will be allotted a certain number, which, I assume, will be only one or two.

Mr. SMOOT. Each Senator will be entitled to about two copies; but, under the law, the Joint Committee on Printing can order printed $200 worth without further action of Congress, and up to $500 worth can be printed by a simple Senate resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If only one or two copies will be allotted to each Senator, that will not anything like take care of the demand that is going to be made for a document of this importance under the present conditions.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I understand that; and when the contingency arises we will then have to meet it. We did not desire to go any further at this time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I will inquire what is the document?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state what the document is.

The SECRETARY. "Manuscript submitted by Mr. WATSON April 12, 1917, entitled 'Data Prepared by the Army War College Relating to Universal Military Training,' together with an accompanying letter from the Secretary of War."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question now is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MILITARY SERVICE ACTS OF GREAT BRITAIN (S. DOC. NO. 9)

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I understand, in view of the conditions now confronting us, that there is quite a demand among those interested for information concerning the military service acts of Great Britain. The Committee on Printing has authorized me to report a resolution, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. The estimated cost is $32.96 to print the document.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 42) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], on April 11, 1917, entitled "Military Service Acts of Great Britain, 1916," be printed as a Senate Document.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE OF WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. THOMPSON. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably with an amendment Senate resolution 40, submitted by Mr. JONES of New Mexico on yesterday, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was, on line 5, after the word "committee," to insert "and that the expenses contracted hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Woman Suffrage, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to employ a stenographer, at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, and that the expenses contracted hereunder shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

DIVERSION OF WATERS OF NIAGARA RIVER.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably without amendment the "Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 13) extending the time within which the joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River" shall remain in effect, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That public resolution No. 45 of the Sixty-fourth Congress, approved January 19, 1917, entitled a "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to issue temporary permits for additional diversions of water from the Niagara River," is continued in full force and effect, and under the same conditions, restrictions, and limitations, until July 1, 1918.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 1007) authorizing the city of Bemidji, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near that place, and I submit a report (No. 20) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELLEN M. STONE RANSOM FUND.

Mr. POMERENE. On yesterday I introduced a bill (S. 1848) for the relief of contributors of the Ellen M. Stone ransom fund, and it was referred to the Committee on Claims. A similar bill has passed the Senate probably four or five times and heretofore has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which committee is entirely familiar with the facts concerning it. Therefore I move that the Committee on Claims be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 1874) for the relief of Samuel Wilson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 1875) granting a pension to Cornelius Branning; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FERNALD:

A bill (S. 1876) for the relief of the States of Massachusetts and Maine; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 1877) prohibiting the issuance of special-tax stamps authorizing the sale of distilled spirits or other intoxicating liquors unless public notice by advertisement has been given, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (S. 1878) to prohibit the dealing in futures on foodstuffs, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 1879) for the relief of John C. Hesse; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ROBINSON:

A bill (S. 1880) for the relief of Jennie Bell Cox, Robert Isaac Clegg, and Thomas Neel Clegg, children and only heirs of Thomas Watts Clegg, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KNOX:

A bill (S. 1881) granting a pension to Maude Lingenfelter (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LA FOLLETTE:

A bill (S. 1882) granting an increase of pension to James R. Rundlett; and

A bill (S. 1883) granting an increase of pension to Nathan H. Ellis; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 1884) to promote the welfare and efficiency of the soldiers of the United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 1885) relating to the reclamation of arid, semiarid, swamp, and overflow lands through district organizations, and authorizing Government aid therefor; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

By Mr. GALLINGER (for Mr. GRONNA):

A bill (S. 1888) to conserve the agricultural food products of the United States and to prohibit their manufacture into alcoholic liquors, except in certain cases; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

ENLISTED STRENGTH OF THE NAVY.

Mr. SWANSON. I introduce a bill to which I call the attention of the members of the Naval Committee. It is a bill to increase the enlisted strength of the Navy to 150,000 men. I wish to state to the members of the Naval Committee that it is the bill we were discussing this morning and which we agreed to consider tomorrow at 10 o'clock.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if it is not possible to have the bill printed at once, so that it may be put in the hands of members of the committee this afternoon to give them an opportunity to familiarize themselves with it?

Mr. SWANSON. I will endeavor to have that done so that the members of the committee may have an opportunity to examine the bill.

Senate bill 1873, to temporarily increase the commissioned and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

INCREASE OF FOOD PRODUCTION.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I introduce two bills that look to the use of the public lands and also lands under reclamation projects for increasing the production of farm products. One of these bills would naturally go to the Committee on Public Lands and the other to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, but they also, as I have said, deal with the matter of increasing the food production, a subject that comes naturally under the consideration of the Agricultural Committee, and I have thought that it would probably be better to have the bills referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as that committee will have consideration of that whole subject. Therefore I ask that the bills may be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that reference will be made.

The bill (S. 1886) to encourage the production of food products on the public lands during the war, and

The bill (S. 1887) to increase the production of agricultural products on lands under reclamation projects during the war were read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1871) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion of Mr. OVERMAN, it was Ordered, That indefinite leave of absence be granted the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 2.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we consider this bill by chapters, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary proceeded to read Chapter I of the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was on page 2, line 18, to strike out the words "SEC. 2. That if," and to insert the word "If," so as to make the paragraph read:

If any owner, agent, master, or person in charge, officer, or member of the crew of any such vessel shall refuse or fail to comply with any such proclamation or Executive order of the President or any regulation or rule issued or order given by the Secretary of the Treasury under the provisions of this chapter, or shall obstruct or interfere with the exercise of any power hereby conferred, such vessel, together with tackle, apparel, furniture, and equipment shall be subject to seizure and forfeiture to the United States in the same manner as merchandise is forfeited for violation of the customs revenue laws; and the person or persons guilty of such failure, refusal, obstruction, or interference shall be subject to a fine of not more than $10,000 or to imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 7, to change the number of the section from 3 to 2; in the same line, after the word "unlawful," to insert "within the territorial waters of the United States"; on line 8, after the words "master or," to insert "any"; on line 10, after the word "domestic," to strike out "within the territorial waters of the United States to," and insert "or for any member of the crew or other person"; and on line 12, after the word "willfully," to insert "to," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. It shall be unlawful within the territorial waters of the United States for the owner or master or any other person in charge or command of any private vessel, foreign or domestic, or for any member of the crew or other person willfully to cause or permit the destruction or injury of such vessel or knowingly to permit said vessel to be used as a place of resort for any person conspiring with another or preparing to commit any offense against the United States, or in violation of the treaties of the United States or of the obligations of the United States under the law of nations, or to defraud the United States, or knowingly to permit such vessels to be used in violation of the rights and obligations of the United States under the law of nations; and in case such vessel shall be so used, with the knowledge of the owner or master or other person in charge or command thereof, the vessel, together with her tackle, apparel, furniture, and equipment, shall be subject to seizure and forfeiture to the United States in the same manner as merchandise is forfeited for violation of the customs revenue laws; and the owner, master, or person in charge or command thereof, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 5, to change the number of the section from 4 to 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 9, to change the number of the section from 5 to 4; and on the same line, after the word "used," to strike out "herein," and insert "in this chapter," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. The term "United States" as used in this chapter shall include the Canal Zone and all territory and waters, continental and insular, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States: Provided, That the Governor of the Panama Canal, with the approval of the President, shall make all necessary rules and regulations to carry into effect the provisions of this chapter in the territory and waters of the Canal Zone within the jurisdiction of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 17, to change the number of the section from 6 to 5.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As the Chair understands the agreement, the committee amendments to this chapter having been disposed of, if there are any other amendments to be made to the chapter they should be offered now.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, calling his attention to lines 8 and 9 on page 2 of the bill, whether it aptly expresses the desire of the committee to use the expression there "to prevent damage or injury to any harbor or waters"? Should not the word "obstruction" as well be in there, so as to clearly express that view? I understand that is the object of the provision.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the object. I do not think it is necessary to put that word in, however.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think it would be a matter of construction in the courts to say that damage or injury to waters meant their obstruction; but I would suggest to the chairman that "obstruction" is a well-known term which might be very aptly used there.

Mr. OVERMAN. Where would the Senator put it?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Just before the word "damage," I think, would be a very good place.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not object to that, Mr. President.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then I move that the word "obstruction" be inserted before the word "damage," in line 9.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On line 9, page 2, before the word "damage," the first word in the line, it is proposed to insert the word "obstruction," with a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further amendments to Chapter I?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise simply to make an inquiry. I think it is quite right to call for amendments as each chapter is read; but I ask whether the chapter will not be open to amendment until the bill passes into the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that under the agreement entered into it will not be open to amendment in the Committee of the Whole unless it is amended now. It will be open to amendment in the Senate, of course.

Mr. CUMMINS. When was that agreement made?

Mr. OVERMAN. It was made at the outset. I thought if there were any amendments to be offered to any chapter they should be offered before we took up the next chapter.

Mr. CUMMINS. Was the agreement made this morning? I ask that the agreement be stated. I did not hear the agreement made. I ask that it may be stated, so that I may understand it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Reporter will read the agreement.

The Reporter read as follows:

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we consider this bill by chapters, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CUMMINS. I submit, Mr. President, that that does not preclude an amendment to a chapter after other chapters have been considered. I think it would be very unfortunate if that were the case, because the Senators are not all here.

Mr. LODGE. The agreement as stated does not cut off amendments.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, this is an entire bill, and if any Senator wants to introduce an amendment to any chapter, I think he should do it while that chapter is being considered. I want to pass the chapters and get them adopted. Then, this being one bill with several chapters in it, after we pass the chapters, at any time before the bill goes into the Senate any Senator may introduce an amendment. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I certainly have none.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then there is no use of the agreement, so far as the Chair can see.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, we will consider the chapters and pass on, and if there are any amendments I should like to have them introduced now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was not the request, and that was not the consent of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as I understood the reading of the request it did not involve the adoption, if you please, of the bill by chapters. It simply provided for the consideration of the committee amendments first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does not amount to anything unless it means that.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I may have misunderstood it. I will ask that the agreement be read again.

The Reporter read as follows:

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we consider this bill by chapters, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. OVERMAN. The agreement is that we shall consider it by chapters, and consider the committee amendments first; but there is nothing in that that cuts off the privilege and right of amendment at the proper time, I take it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has so ruled, in the Committee of the Whole. If the Senate does not want it that way, the Chair does not care anything about it; but in that event there was no necessity for asking for anything except to consider the committee amendments first. If the bill is to be considered as a whole, that is the well-known rule; that is all there is of it; but it was not asked in that way. It was asked to consider it chapter by chapter, the committee amendments to be considered first.

Mr. LODGE. To consider it chapter by chapter; but I can not see that that deprives us of the right of amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does not deprive Senators of the right of amendment. It puts them to the necessity of offering their amendments to this chapter now, before the consideration of the chapter is ended.

Mr. LODGE. Well, anything can be read in to the words, but those are not the words.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, does the agreement that the bill should be considered by chapters mean that each chapter as it is finished should be voted upon as a separate matter and agreed to before proceeding to the next chapter?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair assumed that that was the purpose of it. Now the Senator from North Carolina says he is perfectly willing that amendments shall be offered——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I have no desire to cut off anybody from offering amendments nor to take advantage of anybody. I asked that the bill be considered first by chapters for amendments to the chapters. I could have had the whole bill read first, but I wanted to have the amendments to this chapter adopted and get rid of them. If there are any other amendments to be adopted to this chapter, let them be offered now; but whenever the bill is through with, before it gets into the Committee of the Whole, it is one bill, and I have no objection to the offering of amendments to this chapter at any time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What I mean is after the committee amendments to Chapter I have been agreed to, and after individual Senators have offered their amendments to Chapter I, and they have been agreed to, then does the Senator intend to have a vote upon Chapter I as amended, settling that?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think so, Mr. President. That is my idea.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is what I want to know.

Mr. CUMMINS. To vote on Chapter I?

Mr. OVERMAN. On Chapter I. That is the adoption in Committee of the Whole. Then, before the bill goes to the Senate, any Senator can introduce any amendment to any chapter or any part of the bill. I want to settle it in the Committee of the Whole by chapters.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Having voted on Chapter I and agreed to the amendments, it is then to be considered, as I understand it, as though it were a paragraph of a bill that had been agreed to?

Mr. OVERMAN. Adopted in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In the Committee of the Whole; and then, in the Senate, the whole bill is open to amendment again?

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, of course, Mr. President. That is my understanding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is just what the Chair ruled; but now the Chair does not know whether that is to be lived up to or whether it is not. The Chair just understood from the Senator from North Carolina that he has no objection to amendments being offered to this chapter hereafter.

Mr. OVERMAN. When it gets in the Senate, Mr. President. We are acting in the Committee of the Whole. I want it adopted by chapters, and that was my idea in asking unanimous consent to have it adopted by chapters in the Committee of the Whole. Then, of course, when it gets to the Senate the whole bill is before the Senate and anyone can introduce an amendment. In other words, in Committee of the Whole we do not want to go back over a chapter that has already been adopted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But the Senator understands, does he not—I want to understand it, at any rate—that after the committee amendments to chapter 1 have been agreed to, any individual Senator may offer his individual amendments to chapter 1 before proceeding to others?

Mr. OVERMAN. Exactly. I tried to make myself plain.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want a complete understanding. I did not understand the request of the Senator from North Carolina in that way. It is more than likely that it will prolong the consideration of the bill rather than shorten it, because all the Senators are not here and it is impossible for any Senator to say whether he wants to offer an amendment to this particular chapter or not.

Mr. OVERMAN. He will have plenty of opportunity, if he is not here when the bill is being considered in Committee of the Whole, to offer it in the Senate. I want the chapters considered and adopted, and the amendments offered to the chapters. When we get through with it upon the floor of the Senate let the chapter be adopted, and that is the end of it in the Committee of the Whole. Then, when it gets in the Senate, any Senator can introduce amendments.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not believe there is any parliamentary procedure by which you can adopt a chapter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The usual and customary course of procedure is to request that a bill be read first for committee amendments. That is the usual and ordinary procedure. The Senator from North Carolina has varied that by asking that this bill be considered chapter by chapter, the committee amendments to be first considered. That was the unanimous-censent agreement. The present occupant of the chair can not construe it to mean anything else than this—that before we proceed to Chapter II, any amendments that a Senator desires to offer in the Committee of the Whole shall now be offered. If not now offered, they can not be subsequently offered until the bill gets in the Senate. Of course, there they can be offered. That is the ruling of the Chair on the agreement.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, another parliamentary inquiry. Will it be in order under that ruling to offer another independent chapter to the bill in Committee of the Whole?

The VICE PRESIDENT. To take the place of this chapter?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; an independent chapter on another subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. When the chapters are disposed of it will be. Are there any amendments to be offered to Chapter I at the present time in Committee of the Whole? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, at this point I will make an inquiry of the Senator from North Carolina. I have been otherwise engaged and I have not had time even to read the bill. I ask the Senator if this is substantially the same as the consolidated bill which we passed at the last session, which failed in the other House?

Mr. OVERMAN. It is. It has already passed the Senate. It is the same bill, with some substantial amendments offered by Senators in the Committee on the Judiciary taking away some of the drastic features. This is substantially the same bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what I wanted to know.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there any amendments to Chapter I in Committee of the Whole? The Chair hears none, and Chapter II will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read Chapter II.

The next amendment was, in Chapter II, section 1, on page 5, line 7, after the word "defense," to strike out "to which he is not lawfully entitled" and insert "with intent or knowledge that the information to be obtained is to be used to the injury of the United States, or to the advantage of any foreign nation," so as to read:

SECTION 1. That (a) whoever, for the purpose of obtaining information respecting the national defense with intent or knowledge that the information to be obtained is to be used to the injury of the United States, or to the advantage of any foreign nation, goes upon, or enters, flies over, or induces or aids another to go upon, enter, or fly over any vessel, aircraft, work of defense, navy yard, naval station—

And so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in Chapter II, section 1, on page 6, line 3, after the word "and," to strike out "without lawful authority" and insert "with like intent or knowledge," so as to read:

(b) Whoever, for the purpose aforesaid, and with like intent or knowledge, copies, takes, makes, or obtains, or attempts, or induces or aids another to copy, take, make, or obtain, any sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blue print, plan, model, instrument—

And so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in Chapter II, section 1, page 6, line 24, before the word "note," to insert "or," and in the same line, after the word "note," to strike out "or information"; so as to read:

(d) whoever, lawfully or unlawfully having possession of, access to, control over, or being entrusted with any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blue print, plan, model, instrument, appliance, or note relating to the national defense, willfully communicates, etc.

Mr. POMERENE. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill why the words "or information" are stricken out? It seems to me that they are very appropriate words to have in this statute, unless that subject matter is provided for in another part of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think it is covered in the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. In other portions of the bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think so. I think everything is covered in the bill without putting in those words here. The committee thought that those words are unnecessary in this place.

Mr. POMERENE. I am very clearly of the opinion that if a man had information which he had gleaned from some document or record which might be of value to an enemy and it was given to the enemy he ought to be penalized for it.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will read paragraph (d), with reference to papers, signal books, photographs, photographic negatives, and so forth, he will see that there is no occasion for these words here. That covers information.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize that, but it seems to me it ought to be more comprehensive, and it would not be wrong to have the words retained. If, however, it is provided for in another portion of the bill I have no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in Chapter II, section 2 (a), on page 8, line 3, after the words "shall be," to strike out "imprisoned for not less than 30 years, or by death" and insert "punished by death or by imprisonment for not less than 5 years," so as to read:

Provided, That whoever shall violate the provisions of this paragraph of this section in time of war shall be punished by death or by imprisonment for not less than 5 years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in Chapter II, section 2 (a), on page 8, line 19, after the word "punished," to insert "by death or," and in line 20, after the word "years," to strike out "or by death," so as to read:

Shall be punished by death or by imprisonment for not less than 30 years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in Chapter II, section 2, on page 9, line 9, after the word "imprisonment," to insert:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives or the publication of the same: Provided, That no discussion, comment, or criticism shall convey information prohibited under the provisions of this section.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this is a very important proviso. There are two provisos. The first proviso, I think, is absolutely necessary and proper. The second proviso, it seems to me, takes away the value from the first proviso.

Mr. President, I am as averse to having anything published in the newspapers that would give help to the enemy as anyone can be, and I believe it can not be too rigidly suppressed or too thoroughly punished if the law is violated; but I think to attempt to deny to the press all legitimate criticism either of Congress or the Executive is going very dangerously far.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. BORAH. May I submit a broader question than that, which we may consider as we proceed with the discussion? Under what authority does Congress limit the freedom of the press at all? This establishes a censorship; under what authority do we do that?

Mr. LODGE. There is something in the Constitution which, I think, interferes with it.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think it is within the ingenuity of the human mind to construct a measure which may limit the discussion of these public questions by previous restraint of the press under our Constitution. This has been conscientiously tried, undoubtedly, in this instance; but the question which I want to have considered along with the consideration of the question which the Senator suggests is what power has Congress at all over this subject?

Mr. LODGE. I had not taken up the constitutional point. I think that the first proviso, as I said, removes the great danger from the bill, assuming that the bill is constitutional.

Mr. BORAH. It does remove a great danger from the bill, but the first proviso is a license; it is a permission; something which we can not under the Constitution provide for.

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely.

Mr. BORAH. It is a privilege.

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely.

Mr. BORAH. The very thing which the Constitution prohibits us from creating with reference to the press.

Mr. LODGE. But if that proviso is omitted then the freedom of the press would only be protected by the Constitution, and I am afraid that would be if not a frail a very slow protection. If we are going to pass a bill like this, with which I am in sympathy, I think it will not do to deny the right of legitimate criticism.

Mr. COLT. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. COLT. Is not the liberty of the press subject to limitation? Is there any right enumerated in the first 10 amendments of the Constitution that is not subject to the limitations of the police power or the protection of society?

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator presents that question in the way he has presented it, without any limitation, I would say it is not within the power of Congress to limit the right of the freedom of the press. If the fathers intended anything, beyond question it was to prevent Congress from passing any law, because that is the language—it shall pass no law—limiting the freedom of the press. Will anybody deny that this is the law after it is passed, and will anybody deny that it limits the freedom of the press? If so it is in the very teeth of the language of the Constitution. Does not it clearly provide in advance of publication that unless the censor—to wit, the President—consents, either direct or through his regulations, that upon certain subjects publication shall not be had. And if you can make the President a censor you can make anybody else a censor. Now, you may, if Congress has any jurisdiction at all, punish for results of publication, but you can not set up licensors.

Mr. COLT. I ask the Senator if the law of libel does not limit the freedom of the press?

Mr. BORAH. Not at all. You have a perfect right to publish and then you take the consequences for any injury you do. There is no limitation upon your previous right to publish, and there can not be any placed upon it either.

Mr. COLT. May I ask the Senator, then, if a statute punishing libel would not be an unconstitutional statute?

Mr. BORAH. Not at all.

Mr. COLT. When it limits the freedom of the press?

Mr. BORAH. Not at all; because the freedom to publish is in no sense limited. That is a different proposition entirely. You simply take the consequences of doing an injury to somebody by exercising that freedom.

Mr. OVERMAN and Mr. CUMMINS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield further; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I rose to ask the Senator from Idaho a question. In time of war can the press publish news about the movements of the Army, news about where a submarine base is located, news calculated to injure the United States, to give information to the enemy, and to injure the United States in its conduct of the war?

Mr. BORAH. Let me ask the Senator, who is a distinguished lawyer, if that is true, where is the exception in the Constitution which enables you to limit the freedom of the press during war? What provision or exception relates to war or the right to establish a censorship in times of war? He may publish, and no one in advance of publication can interfere.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator answer my question? Does he think the press should have or would have the right under the Constitution to convey to the enemy news injurious to his own country in time of war?

Mr. BORAH. I answer the question by repeating what I said a moment ago, that the Constitution makes no exceptions. That entire subject is discussed very ably by the father of the Constitution, Mr. Madison, in which he says if the fathers had intended for such an emergency to create a different condition of affairs they would have undoubtedly written into the Constitution "except" so and so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator from Massachusetts pardon me for a question?

Mr. LODGE. I will.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If a newspaper shall publish information when the United States is at war which gave aid and comfort to the enemy, it would be treason. That is the limitation under which the press would operate in time of war.

Mr. BORAH. That is a limitation of the freedom of the press, just the same as punishing a man for libel. You can not prohibit his publishing in the first instance, but you can make it a crime if there is any injurious result from the publication.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand that; but I mean to assert that, to my mind, there is no distinction in the first amendment to the Constitution between the lack of power of Congress to abridge the freedom of speech among the people and its power to abridge the freedom of the press.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think, of course, we must prevent the press from conveying information to the enemy, and we do it, as we prevent libel. We do it by making it a punishable offense or treating it as treason, as the Senator from Connecticut suggests.

I have not the least desire to interfere with the punishment of those who use the freedom of the press for the injury of the United States, but it is going a very long way beyond that when you put it in the hands of the Executive to punish with the heaviest penalty any legitimate criticism in the press which conveys no information of value to the enemy whatever and which is not libelous.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, we are at war. The President is the great Commander in Chief. He is to carry the war, if possible, to a successful conclusion. He, under this amendment, is to make and formulate—and, of course, he will do it in connection with the press—certain rules and regulations as to what shall or shall not be published—not to publish such matter as is calculated to injure the United States. Does the Senator think that any President of the United States would formulate a rule which would prevent legitimate criticism?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, here is what I mean. I will take a specific illustration. We have been told in the press that a board of censorship has been appointed to act as censors over the press of the United States. One of them is a well-known newspaper man. With him are appointed the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War, putting absolutely in the hands of the two departments that conduct this war the power to send to prison any man who criticizes their administration, though not giving information to the enemy.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. WALSH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LODGE. I yield first to the Senator from Nebraska, and shall yield to the Senator from Montana in a moment.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that the proviso which he is discussing applies in time of peace as well as in time of war. It is not limited to the time of war.

Mr. LODGE. I understand the whole bill is limited to the time of war. I do not think I am mistaken about that.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator is mistaken as to that. A great deal of the chapter which we are discussing refers to times of peace as well as to times of war.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, such legislation as this in time of peace would be monstrous, and it should be made to apply only to a time of war.

Mr. CUMMINS. This particular provision is limited to a time of war.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I supposed.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is all limited to a time of war, except the neutrality provision.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts now yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to say that the entire committee were quite in accord with the views now expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts, that no restriction whatever should be placed upon the criticism or comment upon any policy or act of the administration. That there should be no question about that at all, the committee have proposed an amendment to the bill, which appears upon page 9, which they intend, at least, shall cover just exactly that aspect of the case. That amendment provides as follows:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulations herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same: Provided, That no discussion, comment, or criticism shall convey information prohibited under the provisions of this section.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I fully approve of the first proviso. I think it is very desirable that it should be in the bill. My point however, is that the second proviso, as it is drawn, makes the first proviso valueless.

Mr. HUGHES. "Bad," did the Senator say?

Mr. LODGE. I say the second proviso makes the first proviso valueless, I think, as it is worded.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Massachusetts that if we are going to prohibit the publication of this most important information, it would be useless to prohibit it if we should allow it to be conveyed in the course of discussion. Let me say to the Senator from Massachusetts that it was believed that where certain acts or policies of the Government had become public property, they might be referred to as a matter of course in discussion or in comments. That would not be conveying information. Reference has been often made to the criticisms of the Dardanelles expedition and the operations on the peninsula. Those became the subject of very severe criticism, but not before the thing was accomplished; not for the purpose of exposing the whole thing or to the effect of exposing it; but reference, of course, has to be made to the things done in order to afford a basis for comments or discussion. So it could not be asserted, for instance, that the Lord Northcliffe papers conveyed any information in the discussions in which they indulged concerning that episode.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely; he conveyed no information of value to the enemy. That is the definition I want to get into this paragraph. Lord Northcliffe criticized what had been done. My contention is that under the second paragraph what has been done can not be criticized.

Let me put a case to the Senator from Montana. Suppose it was found that on some of the merchant vessels which the Government has armed the shells furnished by the Government either did not explode at all or that they exploded in the gun, and were defective. That would be something that had happened in the past. It would be a matter of moment. We ought to know if such a thing as that had happened. If it had, we ought to know who inspected the shells and where the shells came from. I do not consider that that would be giving information to the enemy.

Mr. WALSH. I quite agree with the Senator from Massachusetts. I am unable to discover, however, how the conveying of information of that character, or reference to a fact of that character in the course of comment or discussion, is prohibited by this provision.

I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the committee—if I may speak for them—were in very entire accord with the views that he is now expressing; and I am very sure that they would be glad to aid and unite with him in making any further change of the language which would more carefully safeguard such legitimate discussion or comment as he has in mind.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, it seems to me that the Senator from Montana is mistaken in saying that the illustration given by the Senator from Massachusetts relating to shells does not convey information.

Mr. LODGE. A past event.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. A past event; and a part of the prohibition of this section is that no information shall be given regarding war materials. Such information would certainly come under that head.

Mr. LODGE. It would.

Mr. WALSH. But that certainly would not apply to war materials that had been spent.

Mr. LODGE. I think it would. I think this language is so broad that it certainly would prohibit the publication of such information.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think so.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Just for an instant. I quite agree with all that the Senator from Massachusetts has said; but I would like to suggest to him as well that the proviso, with which apparently he is in accord and with which he is satisfied, does not in reality accomplish the result which he seeks to attain. A reading of the peculiar and extraordinarily comprehensive language which precedes the first proviso, it seems to me, would indicate that the protection sought to be accorded by that first proviso is in reality not accorded at all. If the Senator will pardon me for an instant——

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If the Senator will follow the language of the act he will see that it reads:

Whoever in time of war, in violation of regulations to be prescribed by the President, which he is hereby authorized to make and promulgate, shall * * * publish—

I am omitting now the words that are unnecessary to indicate the point to which I have adverted—shall publish * * * any information with respect to * * * war materials * * * or with respect to the plans, or conduct, or supposed plans of any naval or military operations * * * or any other information relating to the public defense calculated to be, or which might be, useful to the enemy, shall be punished—

And so forth—

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same.

Indeed, the general provisions of the act, its extraordinarily comprehensive terms, will do the very thing concerning which I think the Senator from Massachusetts is speaking; and the proviso, with which apparently the Senator is content, will not give the liberty of speech nor the liberty of the press which now is sought to be attained.

Mr. LODGE. I now yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I simply desire to interrupt the Senator to make one remark in reference to the illustration he has given. Suppose that it were discovered that the shells on one of our armed merchantmen were defective, and therefore the information ought to be published. That is like a two-edged sword. If it is published the enemy gets information immediately that our merchantmen are armed with shells of that character, and the result would be that they will attack such vessels without any compunction, for they would have nothing to fear. Such information, if it turns out that the shells are defective, should be communicated to the officials of the Government and not be published and advertised to the world, because that would injure us in respect to enemy vessels, who would then be forewarned that they had no danger to encounter, because our armed merchantmen were provided with defective shells.

Mr. LODGE. Does it follow, because the shells are bad on one ship, that they are bad on all ships?

Mr. NELSON. Well, the shells might come from the same factory.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, would it not be better to have a little publication rather than to have our soldiers go into battle with defective shells?

Mr. NELSON. I want to say a word in this connection, but I will not say it now in the Senator's time. I will say it in my own time by and by.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I only desire to make this suggestion to the Senator from Massachusetts and to the Senate: This particular provision will excite a good deal of interest, I am sure, and a great deal of debate, and we are proceeding with it so far upon the theory that it applies only to publications by newspapers, by the press. It applies to every person and to all communications and all discussions, as well as to publications in the general press; and when we are considering what it means and what its effect may be, I think there ought to be in the minds of Senators its broad and comprehensive application.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I realize that it applies to individuals as well as to the press—at least, I so read the bill. I do not know whether this provision is intended to go past the constitutional privilege granted to Members of the two Houses of Congress. If we can go by constitutional privileges and constitutional rights in one respect, I do not see what is to prevent our being called in question for words uttered in debate. If all the constitutional rights are to be passed by, that right may go with the rest.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, would it be any more an exertion of that kind of power to prevent a Senator from expressing himself upon the floor than it is to prevent a newspaper from expressing itself, when they are both protected by the same definite, specific language of the Constitution?

Mr. LODGE. They seem to me to rest on much the same grounds.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. I feel warranted in interrupting the Senator again——

M. LODGE. I am very glad to be interrupted; I want to have the matter discussed.

Mr. WALSH. So as to inform the Senator as to the origin of the language in the proviso he is now discussing. A draft of the proposed censorship bill came to a number of the committee with the heading "Tentative censorship bill agreed upon by the New York newspapers." Whether or not it was so agreed upon, I have no information at all.

Mr. LODGE. Some member of the committee told me there was such a draft. I have never seen it, but I do not think that that really affects the question.

Mr. WALSH. I am sure it does not, but I give the information to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I have been told by a member of the committee—I do not remember whom—that there was such a draft and that the committee had not acceded to it. I have never seen it.

Mr. WALSH. It is the fact. The draft, although it originated in some criticism of the bill on the part of the newspapers, contained provisions which we thought, upon a rather hasty examination, contemplated provisions quite as drastic as those in the bill under consideration; but it has a savng provision in it—section 5—which the committee incorporated as the proviso now being considered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. It had the second proviso as well as the first.

Mr. WALSH. Yes, sir. I will read section 5 of the draft which was thus offered to the committee as having been agreed upon by the New York newspapers, as follows:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives: Provided, That no discussion, comment, or criticism shall convey information prohibited under the provisions of sections 1, 2, and 3.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I have been told that the proviso has been taken from that tentative draft, but it does not alter my opinion that the second proviso practically annuls the first. I think there is a very broad distinction to be drawn between publications which will give aid and comfort to the enemy and interfere with the conduct of the war by the United States—which is in a sense treason—and mere criticism or comment upon what has occurred—something that has already happened and gone into the past.

The Senator from Montana has given an illustration of what I mean—and it was in my mind—in the course of the London Times and others of the Northcliffe papers in criticism of the Government, which undoubtedly led to a change in the ministry. The censorship in England is very severe, if I am correctly informed, and yet no attempt was made to prevent that criticism of what had been done, although the statement by the press of what they thought were the errors in the course pursued by the Government led to the change in the ministry and to the removal of men who were thought by the Parliament or by the country not to be competent for the duties to which they had been assigned.

Under this provision, with the second proviso incorporated, it seems to me that any man who made a speech or wrote a letter or published an article criticizing something that had been done, something that had happened, some operation, could be, at the pleasure of the President, sentenced to undergo all the terrible penalties provided in the bill. It seems to me that is going very, very far, and I am one who is ready to go very far.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator is no doubt familiar with this section, but I desire to call his attention to the fact that all this depends upon whether the information is of a character "relating to the public defense" that is "useful to the enemy"——

Mr. BORAH. "Might be useful to the enemy."

Mr. OVERMAN. "Or which might be useful to the enemy." If men publish information which is useful to the enemy, are we to sit down absolutely helpless and without power to do anything?

Mr. LODGE. Not at all.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is it worth to have a Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and to appropriate $7,000,000,000 if we can not stop comment that is useful to our enemy and against our own country?

Mr. LODGE. But there is a very broad distinction between what is useful to the enemy and what a head of a department says, in his opinion, might be useful to an enemy.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is not the head of a department; it is the court.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; it is the head of a department.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is the court, when he is indicted and faced with the possibility of fine or imprisonment. Every man will have his right in court. If it has not been useful to the enemy, he is innocent. If it is, he is guilty.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to suggest that there is no power here to order punishment for the commission of some act——

Mr. LODGE. Oh, they have to go before the court; I understand that.

Mr. FLETCHER (continuing). Which might be committed before the promulgation of this order. This whole section and all these provisions depend upon the first words:

Whoever, in time of war—

It is limited to that period—

in violation of regulations to be prescribed by the President.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely.

Mr. FLETCHER. Now, there is no offense unless there is a violation of a regulation actually prescribed in advance by the President.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. Not after the publication has been made, but before that, there must be regulations prescribed by the President. Now, is it conceivable that the President would prescribe regulations that are in violation of the Constitution or that would be against individual rights and privileges to an extent that would be unreasonable?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator one question. Is it conceivable that Congress would ever pass an act that violated the Constitution?

Mr. LODGE. Quite conceivable.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It frequently has.

Mr. LODGE. It has done it very often.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then it might be conceivable that the President would make the same mistake.

Mr. LODGE. It is conceivable. Although President—I say it with all respect—I think he is human.

Mr. OVERMAN. If Congress does, it is null and void.

Mr. LODGE. And when you create a censorship board on which you put, as two of the men who are to say what is to go into the newspapers, the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War, and then proceed to arm them with those tremendous powers—because it is a tremendous power to be able to thrust a man into court with all of the machinery of the Government of the United States directed against him—when you put it in the hands of men who are engaged in carrying on these operations, I say you are vesting them with a dangerous power. I should be very sorry to see Senators and Representatives placed on the board of censorship.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, would the Senator strike out this section and not invest them with any power at all?

Mr. LODGE. Not invest whom with any power?

Mr. OVERMAN. The President.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I would invest him with power, but I would not give him unlimited power.

Mr. OVERMAN. But the Senator is talking about the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy. There is nothing said about them.

Mr. LODGE. Well, Mr. President, I expressed myself very unfortunately. I have said that they have been put on a censorship board.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree with that, but that is no reason——

Mr. LODGE. And I think that is a most unfortunate thing.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, that may be; but we are not discussing that question. The question is what the President will do, not what the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy will do.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator knows as well as I do that as a practical thing the President can not attend to every case that comes up. He has to rely on his department heads; and here are two of the department heads, the departments which are most likely to be criticized. They were criticized in the Spanish War. They were so severely criticized in that war that it led to the retirement of the Secretary of War. They were criticized in the Civil War, and it was legitimate criticism, most of it, and some of it illegitimate criticism.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I agree not to give them any power. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. Why, they are the men that are now on the board that will draw the regulations.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, I do not know——

Mr. LODGE. Then what are they doing on the censorship board?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know how that board was appointed, or anything about it. I know what this bill says. I know no more than that we give the President the power to do these things. He may call in the press. Now, the press has come before our committee and submitted a more drastic measure than this is with the proviso in it, and we have adopted what the press asked us to adopt as to the proviso here.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, even if it was drawn by the press I think perhaps they did not see quite how destructive their second proviso was.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I think he need not fear that this board will go to extravagant limits. They are bound by the phraseology of the statute. They can not make any rules or regulations that will go outside the pale of the statute. You can assume that. There can be no dispute about that. The question, then, is, What does the statute contain? Neither this board, nor the President, nor the board that the Senator speaks of can go outside of the pale of this statute. If they do, then they have no power; and the measure is not what this board may do, but what the statute states.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I am trying to address myself to—what the statute states. I know they can not go outside the statute, and it is the statute that gives them such enormous powers.

Mr. NELSON. What does the statute say?

Mr. LODGE. Why, it says, for instance, in those last lines:

> Or any other information relating to the public defense calculated to be, or which might be, useful to the enemy.

Mr. BORAH. Who is to decide what might be useful to the enemy?

Mr. LODGE. Why, the President is to decide. Of course, he will do it through his heads of departments.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; and there could not be any wider discretion than for the man in power to be given the opportunity to say what might be of benefit to the enemy. It is the widest possible discretion that you could confer upon men.

Mr. LODGE. A newspaper article appears criticizing a Senator. Suppose we have representation on the board of censorship. They intimate to the newspaper containing the offensive article that it is likely to be prosecuted and exposed to all this trouble, and perhaps to exclusion from the mails. I have not examined that section. They intimate that the newspaper is to be exposed to that. How long do you think it will go on publishing anything that that Senator does not like? It will stop all criticism unless we put some limitation in that second proviso or strike it out altogether, which would be the best thing.

I am going to move, as an amendment to the amendment, after the words in the second proviso—

> That no discussion, comment, or criticism—

It ought to be "no such discussion, comment, or criticism." I move to insert the word "such" before "discussion"— > shall convey information of value to the enemy prohibited under the provisions of this section.

Mr. LODGE subsequently said: Mr. President, I desire to modify my amendment. I withdraw the amendment which I proposed to the second proviso, and move to strike out the second proviso.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I stated to the committee, when I voted to report this bill out, that I was very doubtful about the power of Congress to enact this provision in the language in which it appears in this bill. I want to read, in order that they may appear as a part of my remarks, a few lines which are embraced in subdivision (c). It reads as follows:

> Whoever, in time of war, in violation of regulations to be prescribed by the President, which he is hereby authorized to make and promulgate, shall collect, record, publish, or communicate, or attempt to elicit any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans, or conduct, or supposed plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense calculated to be, or which might be, useful to the enemy, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same: Provided, That no discussion, comment, or criticism shall convey information prohibited under the provisions of this section.

Mr. President, the Constitution provides, in the first amendment, as follows:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

I agree, Mr. President, that especially in time of war it is very desirable, if it is possible to do so constitutionally, to prevent information being published in the newspapers which may be of benefit to the enemy, and I want to go as far as it is possible to go under our Constitution to put up the bars against the happening of any such event. But, Mr. President, as I stated when I rose, I am exceedingly doubtful whether this subclause (c), which I have quoted, can stand under the constitutional provision which I have read.

It appears from the language of the clause which I have read that the President is authorized to make and promulgate regulations; and whoever in time of war, contrary to any one of those regulations—and nobody knows now what they will be—shall collect, record even in his own diary, publish, or communicate, or attempt to elicit any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States may be punished by a fine of $10,000 and imprisoned for not more than 10 years.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this provision is very badly framed. What does it mean when it says that whoever shall communicate any information with respect to the condition of any of our armed forces or our plans or our operations shall be punished in this way? Communicate to whom? Does it mean that if I think the condition of any portion of our defenses, the condition of any fort or battery, the condition of our troops, or the condition of our food supply is bad, and I tell you so, I am subject to a fine of $10,000 and 10 years' imprisonment? There is no definition at all as to what the communication shall be—whether it shall be orally or in writing or to whom made.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRADY. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that that is precisely what it does mean; that if you communicate it to anybody you are liable to punishment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I agree with the Senator that if the word "communicate" is to be taken in its ordinary acceptation, as I suppose it would be in the construction of this statute, the mere statement by one person to another of the condition, or his opinion of the condition, of any of these things connected with our national defense constitutes a crime.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to call the Senator's attention to some words on that same line in addition to the word "communicate." It also says, "whoever shall collect." Now, it might be that the Senator might collect some of this information for the purpose of using it in the future, after the war was over—as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] suggests, for the purpose of writing a history of the war—but if he was actuated by a motive of gathering information so that when the war was over he could communicate it to Congress with a view of remedying a situation that he conceived or believed to be bad, if he undertook to collect information about spoiled food, or poor clothing, or anything of that sort, he would be subject to this penalty; would he not?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the Senator is right.

Mr. NORRIS. Even though he never communicated it to anybody, if he undertook to collect it, he would have violated the statute.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the Senator is entirely correct in his statement.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he does not think that all of those provisions are limited by the other general provision, that this information must be calculated to be, or might be, useful to the enemy?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. If it is limited in that way, then, merely collecting information for use after the war is all over certainly could not be useful to the enemy or calculated to be useful to the enemy.

Mr. NORRIS. But——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, any of this information thus collected might be of use to the enemy, if it got to the enemy; but the act makes the crime the mere collecting of it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The collecting of the information constitutes the crime.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Precisely.

Mr. NORRIS. You do not have to wait until it is communicated to anybody in order to have the man found guilty.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; but the information itself must be such that it is calculated to be, or might be, useful to the enemy.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Precisely.

Mr. WATSON. But would not a collection of information of that character be of such a nature that it might be useful to the enemy if it should fall into the hands of the enemy?

Mr. FLETCHER. Oh, no; I think——

Mr. WATSON. Why, certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think there must be the disposition and the intention to use it.

Mr. WATSON. Oh, not at all. The intention is not here. It is not set forth; it is not prescribed as a part of it.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will yield to all the Senators as rapidly as I may.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. In answer to the suggestion made by the Senator from Florida, I would like to suggest again to the Senator from Connecticut that the crime will be the violation, perhaps, of a regulation made by the President. It applies to "whoever in time of war" acts in violation of regulations made by the President, which he is authorized to make. The crime may be a violation of regulations not even hinted at in this statute, something that we do not think of.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is precisely the reason, Mr. President, why I thought it was wise to read into the RECORD when I began my remarks the exact language of the proposed statute, so that people could analyze it for themselves.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Or whoever shall "attempt to elicit any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials," which information might be useful to the enemy. Suppose a newspaper correspondent were to go into the office of the Secretary of War and talk to him about the number of troops that were in a certain division or under a certain command, or about the movement of those troops, whether that information is ever used or not, whether it is ever published or not, under the terms of this provision that in and of itself makes him guilty of a violation of the statute. It applies to whoever attempts to elicit information which might be useful to the enemy.

Mr. BORAH. That clause is designed to protect the time of the head of the department from being interrogated with reference to the situation.

Mr. OVERMAN. It all depends upon the regulations prescribed by the President.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely, but we are giving him power here by the language——

Mr. OVERMAN. If we can not give such power, then God help this country.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut a question right there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. My query is directed rather to the Senator having charge of the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not want to precipitate a joint debate between two other Senators while I have the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator will see the pertinency of it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will allow the Senator to ask me any question he wants to.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I will ask it of the Senator having the floor. Does the Senator think we have the power, even in an emergency of this kind, to invest the Chief Magistrate with the right to make a regulation the nonobservance of which will lead to the imposition of these tremendous penalties?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I regret to say that I am afraid we have the power to invest the President with that right. I am not absolutely certain, but there were presented before the Committee on the Judiciary certain decisions, and though I did not examine them myself, it was stated that where Congress had passed an act authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to make certain regulations as to forest reservations and acts committed in violation of those regulations had been made a crime, the Supreme Court had sustained it. But I had not personally examined that decision.

Mr. THOMAS. I have had occasion, during my practice at the bar, to defend one or two individuals charged with perjury, and the defense which I made, and effectually, was that the violations were of a regulation of the department and not of a statute of the United States. So there are decisions both ways.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It was a very recent decision. I think it was the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] who called it to the attention of the committee. I do not know the title of the case. I will ask the Senator from Montana to state it.

Mr. WALSH. I think perhaps I can clarify the matter a little by saying that a number of lower courts did so decide, as suggested by the Senator from Colorado, and I have no doubt he contended successfully, but when the case eventually got to the Supreme Court of the United States they overruled it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Can the Senator cite us to that decision?

Mr. WALSH. I have sent for it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My recollection is the Senator said it was in Two hundred and twenty-first United States Supreme Court Reports.

Mr. WATSON. Then the decision set aside the express provision of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The decision itself will be here in a few moments.

Mr. WALSH. The decision considered the power of Congress to pass such a law as that under the Constitution of the United States and sustained the power.

Mr. WATSON. But did the thing finally to be done overthrow or set aside the Constitution? For instance, has Congress the power to confer upon the President the power to set aside a provision of the Constitution, thereby enabling Congress, in the first instance, to violate the Constitution? Certainly not. We all know what amendment 1 of the Constitution is, that Congress shall make no law prohibiting the freedom of speech or the freedom of the press. Now, this proposed law in and of itself does abridge the freedom of the press. Have we the power to pass a law conferring upon the President the right to set aside the Constitution?

Mr. WALSH. I did not rise to address myself to that question. I will have a word to say about it presently in my own time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Irrespective of whether Congress can delegate to the President the right to make regulations which have the force of criminal statutes, I think that Congress ought to consider—and that is all I am on my feet for now—and Congress ought to consider very carefully this provision before it acts upon it. I myself would have preferred if the committee had reported the other parts of this espionage bill, so called, and had left this question for the future, and had provided for it by a separate bill, because I think the question involves such a vital issue to the country that Congress should give it more consideration, and it could give it better consideration if it were before it as a separate proposition. However, the matter is here now.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. May I suggest an amendment which I think would probably cover the view the Senator has? The difficulty with this language is that it is so broad there appears to be no limitation at all. It might result in the most dangerous tyrannical use on the part of a subordinate. While the United States Congress has the right to declare war and to pass acts which are necessary to make it effectual, and may not interfere with the freedom of the press, it may interfere with the license of the press or with such conduct on the part of the press as would make the war a failure.

I think that this insertion would probably cover the point: In line 7, on page 9, after the word "enemy," where it reads "or which might be useful to the enemy," insert "with the view or with the effect of making the same available or accessible to the enemy." I think that might possibly cover the matter.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, that, as I view it now hastily, would put subdivision (c) on exactly the same parity and make it occupy the same ground as subdivision (b), which deals with the doing of these things with the intent that the same shall be communicated to the enemy. Of course, if that were interpolated I would be in favor of raising the penalty in subdivision (c) to death instead of 10 years, because it would then be clearly treason if a man elicited and compiled information with the intent of furnishing it to the enemy.

Mr. OWEN. "With the intent or with the effect of."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. "With the effect of."

Mr. OWEN. He may deny the intent, but if he does a thing which puts a vital piece of information in the hands of the enemy to the destruction of our own forces there ought to be a serious penalty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If he did it innocently and somebody else stole it from him, or something of that kind, and furnished it to the enemy we would hardly want to shoot the man who had no such intention.

Mr. OWEN. That would be a case for the jury or for the officers who might have the matter in charge, of course.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thank the Senator for making the suggestion. I admit it may be possible to insert some words here that would be very valuable.

Mr. OWEN. I suggest the insertion of those words and leave it to the conferees to work out a measure that will effectuate the purpose and intent along that line.

I therefore move, on line 7, page 9, after the word "enemy," to insert the words "with the view or with the effect of making the same available or accessible to the enemy."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the amendment is not in order just at this minute, and, in addition, I have the floor. The Senator from Massachusetts has already moved an amendment to the committee amendment, which is now under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will recognize the Senator to move the amendment at the proper time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It appears that this penalty of 10 years' imprisonment and $10,000 fine is to be inflicted upon not only the newspapermen, but upon every person in the country who makes a perfectly innocent and laudable inquiry about the condition of our national defenses if that inquiry violates some regulation to be prescribed by the President, not yet known at all, and it might result in being useful to the enemy.

Mr. President, the language of this subdivision is so couched that the whole press of the country and all the people of the country are asked to suspend an unknown guillotine over their necks to drop upon the commission of something that is declared to be criminal but which is not yet reduced to writing. In the midst of the most gigantic struggle that the world has ever seen, with the whole country of 100,000,000 people aroused with patriotic fervor, with their feelings stirred to a depth never before attained since the days of our Civil War, we are asked to put in the hands of the President of the United States a power to issue some regulations which will prevent a single citizen of this country from asking a question about the state of our national defense. As I said, I would cheerfully vote for an extreme legislative measure if we can pass any without violating the Constitution and abridging the freedom of the press, which will prevent damaging publications in the newspapers which give any advance information or aid and comfort to the enemy. Of course, if I would not do that I would not have voted for the $7,000,000,000 to maintain the rights of the United States and to prosecute this war.

The Senator from North Carolina asks, Do you doubt the patriotism of the great President of the United States? Are you not willing to place in the hands of your Commander in Chief these powers? Mr. President, I do not doubt the patriotism of the Commander in Chief and I am going to follow him as long as he leads the country as he has started out to do, and I rejoice he has started; but this puts in the hands of the President the making of a whole lot of regulations absolutely about all the things described in this language. We do not know what regulations he is going to make. He is going to make anything that he thinks is necessary. Think of the power that gives him!

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. With pleasure.

Mr. CUMMINS. The point that is being made by the Senator from Connecticut impresses me very much. I want to ask him this question: Suppose that the campaign—I call it a campaign, because I believe it has been one—for preparedness is continued and our weakness from a military point of view is pointed out from day to day, would not all such discussions and all such publications be an offense under this bill if the President of the United States saw fit to make it so?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly, Mr. President; the bill clearly so states, and that is what I say. It gives the President authority to make any regulations he sees fit about what people shall say to each other, what sort of inquiries they shall make, what information newspaper reporters shall obtain, what they may ask the departments. The President of the United States under the bill makes one of his regulations that no newspaper reporter shall visit any of the departments after the promulgation of these regulations to make an inquiry about the state of our troops or how the enlistments are going on, or whether the supplies are coming forward rapidly, or whether the contracts have been let, or whether the President intends to take possession of the railroads, anything of that kind, concerning which the President had said a newspaper shall not make inquiry. Here is the language of the bill, "That whoever shall attempt to elicit any information" with respect to any of these things, to the condition of our forces, ships, aircraft, war materials, or military operations "or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with or intended for the fortification or defense of any place," and so forth, shall be liable to 10 years in prison or a $10,000 fine.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is now exciting my attention. What he says, I imagine, would be broad enough to include a member of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There is no special exception for such a gentleman, I assure the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I should think so.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I ask the Senator if there is not one qualification, that it shall be an expression of a fact which may be useful to the enemy; but it is a qualification so indefinite that it amounts to little or naught. I quite agree with what the Senator has said. We may well pause, as he indicates, lest in our tenderness for democracy abroad we forget democracy at home.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I entirely agree with the Senator from California. All these things are subject to that qualifying clause, to wit, "If this information might be useful to the enemy." Of course that can not mean anything except this, that it might be useful to the enemy if he had possession of it. Of course it could not be useful to him if he still remained in ignorance of it. If it means that, it means that you are prohibited from acquiring it for your own benefit and your own knowledge.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. On that point I think it ought to be emphasized that the crime is committed when you undertake to elicit the information. You are just as guilty, although the enemy may never find it out.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course.

Mr. NORRIS. It is not necessary for the enemy to ever know anything about it in order to be guilty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; the bill does not say that with the information you ask for or the facts that you collect you would be guilty of a crime if in any way it got into the possession of the enemy; it says as to all these things which might be useful to the enemy if he knew them you shall be prohibited as a friend from inquiring anything about them.

Mr. President, I heard one of the Senators from one of the States that border along the Mexican boundary line discussing the other day the state of affairs along that boundary and deploring certain features of the arrangements and disposition of our troops there. Under this bill anybody in his State or in any of those border States who attempts to ascertain the condition of our defense along the boundary line there, running from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast, if it is done in violation of any regulations that the President may lay down utterly unknown to us now, is guilty of this crime.

I agree entirely with what the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has pointed out. It is perfectly obvious that the first proviso, which says "Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same" does not relieve the situation at all. It relieves it so far as commenting or criticising acts or policies of the Government are concerned, but it does not relieve the man who elicits or attempts to elicit some information with respect to the condition of our national defense, or of all the thousand and one phases into which it is divided. It does not help him at all.

Here are a whole lot of things prohibited if done in violation of certain regulations to be thought out and prescribed in the future by the President, and the first proviso says that these prohibitions shall not be construed to limit or restrict discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government. The second proviso says:

> Provided, That no discussion, comment, or criticism shall convey information prohibited under the provisions of this section.

That is, the bill says you shall not do certain things and the first proviso says you may under certain conditions, and the second proviso says you may under certain conditions, provided you do not violate the previous part of the law. It is whipping the devil right around the stump, and going around in a circle.

Mr. President, I have said all I care to say at present on this subject. I can not conceive that it is within the mental ability of any men or of any board of censors to sit down now, if this act were law, and out of their inner consciousness evolve a set of regulations and rules which will prescribe the conditions under which the people and the press of this country may for the next year, under all the abnormal circumstances that exist and under all the emergencies and multitudinous and kaleidoscopic changes that are sure to arise, provide now a set of regulations which will in any adequate way give either the press or the public of this country that due notice to which they are entitled—the definition of what they may do and what they may not do.

Mr. President, it is a fundamental idea, and goes to the foundation of free governments, that people who are to be sent to the jails for the commission of crimes are entitled to have those crimes so defined in advance that they are sure, with the exercise of ordinary intelligence, that they do not violate them.

Mr. KELLOGG. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does not subdivision (b) cover what is necessary in time of war to prevent the collection of such information for the sake of publishing it to the enemy?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am inclined to think, as I stated to the Senator from Oklahoma, that it does; at least that it is enough to start with. This is a novel condition with us, and perhaps we could afford to feel our way along a bit and not try to do everything in advance.

Mr. STERLING. I do not know whether from the answer given to the question of the Senator from Minnesota the Senator from Connecticut takes into consideration the first part of subdivision (b) which makes the offense there to depend upon the intent. "Whoever in time of war with the intent that the same shall be communicated to the enemy," whereas subdivision (c) covers the other class of cases where there may be no intent at all for the purpose of preventing publications or communicating without regard to intent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was just about to read that when the Senator from South Dakota rose. All I wanted to say about that is that I am rather inclined to think that it would suffice at present if these heavy penalties were put upon the commission or the doing of these acts with the intent to have them made useful to the enemy. There will be a thousand and one acts which under the language of subdivision (c) will be criminal if they should result in aid to the enemy, but there ought not to be, it seems to me, a crime made of something collected in good faith, or some information solicited for a lawful purpose about our own country and our own conditions simply because it might be made useful to the enemy if somebody conveyed it to them; and that is the language of this subdivision.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Has the Senator from Connecticut noticed section 1 of Chapter XII, with a view to its application in the enforcement of paragraph (c) in section 2, which he is now discussing? Section 1 relates to the use of the mails and it provides that "every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication, matter, or thing, of any kind, in violation of any of the provisions of this act, or intended or calculated to induce, promote, or further any of the acts or things by any provision of this act declared unlawful," shall be nonmailable matter. I would like the Senator's view as to the power there given to the Postmaster General to prevent the circulation of newspapers conveying something that he might believe to be calculated to induce or promote some violation of the law.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I will say that I was ill most of the time when this bill was under consideration before the committee; and while I knew there was such a section in the bill as that which the Senator has just read, I had not read it; but as I read it and as he has read it to me just now, it would, of course, seem to me to be a tremendous power to repose in the hands of a Cabinet official—the power absolutely to prohibit from the mails any sort of publication, matter, or thing which he thought violated some regulation made by the President under the terms of this bill.

Mr. President, what I have said is designed simply to present for the consideration of the Senators who have not given it very deep consideration some of the views that I now hold. If I could be persuaded that this was necessary, I should vote for it. I very much dislike to vote for what seems to me on the face of it to be an unconstitutional law, and to be persuaded into doing it on the theory that strong measures are necessary; and that, if the act is unconstitutional, a man can get his relief after wading through several criminal trials, and finally going to the Supreme Court of the United States. I think it is our duty in advance to try not to pass unconstitutional measures. If this provision does not abridge the freedom of the press and the freedom of speech, as inhibited by the first amendment to the Constitution, I confess that the English language has lost its meaning to me. I can not understand what would be an abridgement of the freedom of speech or of the freedom of the press if subdivision (c) does not so abridge it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am moved to say a few words on the pending matter—moved more by some comments made by the Senator from the State of Idaho [Mr. BORAH] than to address myself to the amendment tendered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], which is the pending question, although I shall say a word about that in conclusion.

I very much regret that the Senator from Idaho seems to have left the Chamber; but I gathered from his remarks that he was under the impression that the Congress of the United States is without power to pass any such legislation as that under discussion, namely subdivision (c) of section 2 of the bill under consideration. If I understood the Senator from Idaho aright, he contended that the right guaranteed to a citizen of the United States by the provisions of the first amendment of the Constitution prohibited the Congress of the United States from penalizing the publication of anything; that the amendment to the Constitution which says that Congress shall pass no law abridging the liberty of speech or of the press is a permission and a guaranty of the right of any man to print whatever he pleases without being subject to be called to account for it. Of course, no one can believe that that is the meaning of that provision of the Constitution. The liberty of the press is not so broad in its scope as to be without any limitations whatever. Of course, everybody recognizes——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WALSH. I shall yield in a moment. Of course, everybody recognizes this limitation upon it at least, that published matter shall not be a libel against anyone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to say to the Senator from Montana that I am under the impression that he misunderstood the position of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. WALSH. I shall be very glad to be corrected.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think the Senator from Idaho stated clearly that the press had a right to publish, but that they were held, of course, responsible, and laws could be passed holding them responsible for damages.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, Mr. President, that is putting the matter in another way, in a way that is quite inapplicable to the discussion before us. Many courts have held—it has been so held, and very rightly, by the supreme court of my State, I believe—that under a provision of this character it is beyond the power of a court to issue an injunction beforehand preventing the publication of anything, and particularly of anything that is not libelous; but we do not attempt in this proposed act to restrain the commission of the acts made punishable, to prevent by the process of injunction the publication of such articles. The publication of them is made criminal. So the bill under consideration presents exactly the case of a libel statute in which a penalty is prescribed for the publication of the article, and not of an injunction statute, which attempts to prevent the publication of the article in the first place.

Of course, Mr. President, the right to print is limited impliedly. So there can be no doubt about that. The right to print is limited so that one may not print things which constitute a contempt of court. As, for instance, one can not print while a case is on trial any comment upon the matter on trial that would be calculated to influence the court or the jury in the determination of the questions before them. So I can not doubt that the right to print—the liberty of speech and of the press—is also limited in this regard, that no one ought to be permitted to print anything in time of war that would give substantial aid to the enemy of the country. The publication of matter of that character, I think, can not be regarded as embraced within the liberty of speech and of the press that is guaranteed by the first amendment to the Constitution.

This matter received the consideration of the Supreme Court of the United States a few years ago in a case in which the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] was one of the counsel. It was a proceeding against a former Senator of the United States—Senator Patterson. He published in his paper certain matters concerning a lawsuit upon trial, the publication of which was regarded as a contempt of court. He subsequently urged, as I understand the Senator from Idaho now to urge, that perfect liberty to print is accorded by this amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yfeld to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. BORAH. The only thing the court held, as I recall it, was that while there could not be an inhibition against the printing, there could be a punishment for having printed something which ought not to have been printed.

Mr. WALSH. That is quite right. Neither is there any effort made here to exercise the injunctive power to restrain or prevent the printing in the first place; but it is in the same way made punishable afterwards if it should be printed. Just what was decided by the court can be gathered from the comment on the case, which will be found in the second volume of Willoughby on the Constitution, section 450. After referring to what was said in that case, the author remarks:

> It would thus appear that the prohibition of the first amendment relative to the abridgement of freedom of speech or press not only leaves to the Federal courts the authority to grant relief to persons libeled or slandered. and to punish for contempt the publication or utterance of statements reflecting upon its own dignity or calculated to interfere with the proper and efficient administration of justice and the execution of its writs, but that it preserves, or at least does not restrict, the power of Congress to declare criminal and provide punishment for the publication or open advocation of doctrines or practices calculated to destroy or interfere with the exercise of its constitutional powers.

I shall presently refer to the opinion in the case of Patterson against Colorado (205 U. S., 454), but while I have the work in my hand I will read the succeeding chapter from Willoughby, which is exceedingly pertinent to the subject under discussion. The author goes on to say:

> Thus it would seem beyond question that Congress may define and punish seditious libel, provided the publication extends to acts which clearly tend to sedition. The famous sedition act of 1798 never came before the Supreme Court, but was upheld as constitutional by three Federal judges; and by those criticising it, the argument rather was that the act was too broad, than that seditious libel, properly defined, might not be punished.

That act, as we all know, has been made the subject of much adverse criticism and comment even of a most violent character; but it has rarely been urged, so far as my recollection of the discussion goes, that it was an unconstitutional exercise of the power of Congress.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator, however, will remember that Mr. Madison did take the position in a very learned brief that the act was wholly unconstitutional. That law. however did not go any further than to punish false and malicious publications.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but I shall immediately call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has held that it is entirely immaterial whether or not the representations were true or false; that it is within the power of the Congress of the United States to punish the publication of things that are true, that are calculated, for instance, to interfere with the administration of justice, and in like manner I think it can not be disputed that it is in the power of the Congress of the United States to forbid the publication, even of matters that are true, obviously calculated to aid the public enemy of the United States.

I refer now to what was said by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Patterson against Colorado. I read from the opinion, as follows:

> The main purpose of such constitutional provisions—
>
> That is, including the one under consideration—
> is to prevent all such previous restraints upon publications as had been practiced by other governments, and they do not prevent the subsequent punishment of such as may be deemed contrary to the public welfare. Commonwealth v. Blanding (3 Pick., 304, 313, 314; Respubica v. Oswald (1 Dallas, 319, 325). The preliminary freedom extends as well to the false as to the true; the subsequent punishment may extend as well to the true as to the false. This was the law of criminal libel apart from statute in most cases, if not in all. Commonwealth v. Blanding, ubi sup. (4 Bl. Com., 150).
> In the next place, the rule applied to criminal libels applies yet more clearly to contempts. A publication likely to reach the eyes of a jury declaring a witness in a pending cause a perjurer would be none the less a contempt that it was true. It would tend to obstruct the administration of justice, because even a correct conclusion is not to be reached or helped in that way, if our system of trials is to be maintained. The theory of our system is that the conclusions to be reached in a case will be induced only by evidence and argument in open court and not by any outside influence, whether of private talk or public print.
> What is true with reference to a jury is true also with reference to a court. Cases like the present are more likely to arise, no doubt, when there is a jury and the publication may affect their judgment. Judges generally, perhaps, are less apprehensive that publications impugning their own reasoning or motives will interfere with their administration of the law. But if a court regards, as it may, a publication concerning a matter of law pending before it as tending toward such an interference it may punish it, as in the instance put. When a case is finished, courts are subject to the same criticism as other people, but the propriety and necessity of preventing interference with the course of justice by premature statement, argument, or intimidation hardly can be denied. (Ex parte Terry, 128 U. S., 289.)

So, Mr. President, whenever the military enterprise has been concluded and is completed, then any kind of comment concerning it may be indulged in by the press; but while it is in fieri, then it is within the power of Congress beyond a question, if it is deemed against the public interest, that it should be made the subject of discussion to prevent it.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Rhode Island for a question?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. COLT. The Senator from Montana has made a very thorough and deep study of this subject. I desire to ask him, when we come to the limitation or qualification of what we term "individual rights," does it not rest fundamentally upon the ground of the police power; that is—I am using the term "police power" in a broad sense—that these rights may be limited when it is necessary for the safety or the welfare of society; that the right of private property, the right of contract, the right of religious freedom, and the right of freedom of the press are not abstract natural rights but are rights which must yield or be modified where the welfare or safety of society is concerned?

I am not going into the details, but I wanted to know if this is not the general philosophy underlying this subject—that for the sake of the protection of society we have come, through interpretation and construction, to qualify in a measure the literal meaning of what we call individual rights as set forth in the Constitution.

Mr. WALSH. It occurs to me that the Senator has stated the case with accuracy and that, I take it, is the purport of this declaration of the Supreme Court of the United States, to the effect that these provisions of the Constitution do not prevent the subsequent punishment of such publication as would be deemed contrary to the public welfare. And acts so punishable do not run counter to the provision of the Constitution which is here appealed to.

So, Mr. President, I can not doubt for one moment that it is easily within the constitutional power of the Congress of the United States to punish the publication during a time of war of any information that may be of benefit to the public enemy, and that to do so is no infringement whatever of the privileges guaranteed by the Constitution.

Whether as a matter of policy—not as a matter of power, but as a matter of policy—the language of subdivision (c) is broader than it ought to be, or as to whether it ought not to be limited by amendment to be introduced, I do not undertake to controvert; but that we have power to legislate upon the subject, I think is not open to very serious dispute.

But, Mr. President, it has been suggested that there is another constitutional objection to this provision, in that it authorizes the President to make rules and regulations upon this subject, the character of which, of course, is not known in advance, and makes the violation of the rules and regulations thus prescribed by the President a penal offense. It is urged that that is an unwarranted delegation of power; that while the Congress of the United States could make the doing of these acts and the publication of information of a certain character a penal offense, it is beyond the power of the Congress to delegate the making of rules and regulations upon the subject to the President and making the violation of those rules and regulations a penal offense. There would be room, Mr. President, for much argument on that contention if it had not already been settled, as I take it, by an authoritative decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. The case was referred to by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] in the course of his argument, and the character of the matter presented likewise was quite correctly stated. The case to which he referred is the case of United States against Grimaud, reported in Two hundred and twentieth United States, at page 506.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho for a question?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I rose to ask, in view of the fact that I am compelled to leave the Senate Chamber on a matter of official business, if this amendment, after the Senator has concluded his address, might not be passed over until I have time to submit some remarks?

Mr. OVERMAN. I will offer no objection to having it go over if the Senator desires to address the Senate upon it.

Mr. BORAH. I mean, of course, after the Senator from Montana concludes his remarks.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I read from the opinion in the case to which I have referred, as follows:

> The defendants were indicted for grazing sheep on the Sierra Forest Reserve without having obtained the permission required by the regulations adopted by the Secretary of Agriculture. They demurred on the ground that the forest reserve act of 1891 was unconstitutional in so far as it delegated to the Secretary of Agriculture power to make rules and regulations and made a violation thereof a penal offense. Their several demurrers were sustained. The Government brought the case here under that clause of the criminal appeals act (Mar. 2, 1907, c. 2564, 34 Stat., 1246), which allows a writ of error where the "decision complained of was based upon the invalidity of the statute."

The court continues:

> The Federal courts have been divided on the question as to whether violations of those regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture constitute a crime. The rules were held to be valid for civil purposes in Dastervignes v. United States, 122 Fed. Rep., 30; United States v. Dastervignes, 118 Fed Rep., 199; United States v. Shannon, 151 Fed. Rep., 863; S. C., 160 Fed. Rep., 870. They were also sustained in criminal prosecutions in United States v. Deguirro, 152 Fed. Rep., 568; United States v. Domingo, 152 Fed. Rep., 566; United States v. Bale, 156 Fed. Rep., 687; United States v. Rizzinelli, 182 Fed. Rep., 675. But the regulations were held to be invalid in United States v. Blasingame, 116 Fed. Rep., 654; United States v. Matthews, 146 Fed. Rep., 306; Dent v. United States, 8 Arizona, 138.

I dare say it is one of these cases in which the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], who is about to leave the Chamber, represented the successful defendant.

Mr. THOMAS. What was that?

Mr. WALSH. I say that reference is made in the opinion to two Federal cases and a decision of the Supreme Court of Arizona.

Mr. THOMAS. What case is referred to in which I participated?

Mr. WALSH. I do not know. I say possibly the Senator was counsel in one of them. The cases referred to are United States v. Blasingame (116 Fed. Rep., 654); United States v. Matthews (146 Fed. Rep., 306); and Dent v. United States (8th Ariz., 138).

Mr. THOMAS. I was not engaged in any of those cases.

Mr. WALSH. In any event those cases supported the doctrine which the Senator from Colorado advanced as possibly the correct law. The court, however, sustained the indictment and held that it was within the power of Congress to delegate to the Secretary of Agriculture the making of these regulations, and it is within its power to make the violation of those regulations a penal offense.

Mr. President, only a word about the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I do not see why any of those who support the general principle of this provision in the bill should offer the slightest objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. I trust that the Senator in charge of the bill, for the purpose, at least, of expediting the consideration of it, will agree to the amendment, because, in my judgment, the significance of the law would not be even in the slightest degree altered by the adoption of the amendment. A proviso ordinarily is intended only to make more clear that which goes before it. The acts prohibited are specifically set out in the first part of the subdivision, and then the proviso that it shall not be deemed to exclude discussion or comment or criticism makes an explanation of what goes before. So the second proviso is simply an explanation of what precedes, and, in my estimation, the act will have the same construction whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is adopted or not.

I am not quite clear in my own mind that we might not with entire wisdom amend the earlier part of the section so as to obviate some of the objections that have been urged against this proposed law, but I think all will agree that it is eminently wise that we have some law upon this subject.

I should like to say that a number of the members of the committee who did not have the benefit of the full discussion of this bill which was indulged in before the committee, coming in hurriedly, reached the conclusion that was arrived at by the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], that all the necessities of the case were met by the provisions of subdivision (b); but upon reflection it will be easily discovered that subdivisions (b) and (c) are intended to meet entirely different conditions. Of course, all will agree that the things denounced by subdivision (b) should be punished; that is, the gathering of these things with the intent and purpose to convey them to the enemy, but——

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. But, if the Senator will pardon me for a moment, subdivision (c) is intended to reach the case of a publication of these things without any sinister purpose at all. An energetic and enterprising newspaper reporter, with no purpose at all to aid the enemy, but simply with the very commendable purpose of extending the circulation of his paper, collects a whole mass of this information and publishes it. Another man may gather it and publish it, having some consideration for his own political future or something of that character, having no purpose whatever that it shall be communicated to the enemy. In other words, subdivision (b) is not a censorship statute at all; subdivision (c) is the censorship statute.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Minnesota for a question?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask the question with a view of eliciting from the Senator from Montana whether in his opinion subdivision (c) is necessary after enacting subdivision (b)? I did not hear the discussion before the Judiciary Committee, but I take it that the Senator from Montana does not think subdivision (b) is sufficient.

Mr. WALSH. I should say not. I should say, in the first place, that we ought to go quite beyond the case of the man who accumulates the stuff and publishes it with the treasonable purpose of aiding the enemy. We ought to go to the man who incautiously does it, without any such deliberate purpose, but whose acts really are as destructive to our interests as the acts of the man who went about to do it for the very purpose of having the information communicated to the enemy.

Mr. KELLOGG. Would the Senator from Montana think there was any danger of an innocent person seeking information being punished under this act?

Mr. WALSH. I think there is. I have no doubt that there is that danger; and seeing that it is a war measure, applicable only in time of war, the committee believed that we could well afford to subject the innocent citizen to whatever discomfort might come to him by reason of this act, rather than to allow promiscuous publications to be made that might be invaluable to the enemy.

The revered chairman of the Judiciary Committee called our attention to the fact that during the Civil War Gen. Lee complained and complained in the most bitter manner that all of his purposes were disclosed by the newspapers of the city of Richmond before he had an opportunity to mature them or to bring them to a successful fruition.

By way of illustration, Mr. President, let us suppose, now, that we are going to send troops across the water to engage in the war over there. Everybody can recognize that it would be a most unwise thing to permit papers to publish to the world just how many men were to be sent and where they were to be sent from and the vessel upon which they were to go, and all the terms and conditions of their departure. Obviously, a wise military policy will keep matters of that kind as secret as can possibly be done.

The press recognize that that is a necessity, and they have quite generously come forward and observed the request of the department not to give publication to these things. But, Mr. President, suppose that to-day some enterprising newspaper should go to work and publish information concerning the very ship, for instance, upon which the French commissioners are coming to this country to-day. It is not at all improbable that it will be necessary for us in the very near future to send a commission upon an armed ship of the United States to the Republic of Russia, for instance. It would be a most unwise thing if newspapers should publish that; and we are at the risk all the time of having it done, without any law which would make the publication of matters of that kind punishable at all.

The committee, I am very sure, have no desire whatever to limit the press in this matter further than the necessities of the case before us require.

Mr. KELLOGG. I assure the Senator from Montana that I was not intending to express an opinion; but, not having heard the discussion before the committee, I wished to obtain the Senator's opinion on this question.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I had intended to defer a discussion of this bill until Chapter VII was reached; but the discussion of subdivision (c) of section 2 has been so spirited, and at the same time so important and interesting, that before it goes over I wish to submit some observations regarding it.

Of course, we all realize the very serious and far-reaching crisis now upon us, requiring the exercise of extraordinary precautions and the enactment of extraordinary measures designed to meet and overcome it. We also realize the importance of placing restrictions upon all matters which, without them, might, through the information concerning them transmitted to the enemy, result to our disadvantage, if not to our very great injury; hence I am entirely in accord with the purpose of the measure. But, Mr. President, a hasty reading of this bill—and I only saw it this morning for the first time—creates the impression that in our zeal to protect the Government against certain existing and apprehended dangers we may go so far to the other extreme as to inflict a greater injury and more permanent injury than those which it is designed to avoid; and it is that apprehension which prompts me to offer some views regarding this specific subsection.

The general purport of section 2, under the title of "Espionage," is to prohibit, under very severe penalties, the obtaining and transmission of information to the enemy. It is drawn very comprehensively, and a superficial reading of it would seem to indicate that every possible avenue of action and activity has been covered. Subdivisions (a) and (b) are subject, in my judgment, to some very serious criticisms; but I am not inclined to make them here, because it is highly probable that everything covered by those subdivisions needs the legislation which is here proposed. But subdivision (c), Mr. President, which might be called a sort of general welfare clause of the section—a provision designed to include any and every possible omission from that part of the section which precedes it—is a most remarkable production.

It is provided that—> whoever, in time of war, in violation of regulations to be prescribed by the President, which he is hereby authorized to make and promulgate, shall collect, record, publish, or communicate, or attempt to elicit any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans, or conduct, or supposed plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense calculated to be, or which might be, useful to the enemy, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Provision is there made, Mr. President, for a series of offenses the commission of any one of which may subject a citizen of the United States to the loss of his entire patrimony and to the loss of his liberty for a maximum period of 10 years; and in the commission of any one of these offenses he might commit two or three others, and each, in succession, would subject him to the same character and degree of punishment. Now, it is obvious from every standpoint that a statute capable of producing such consequences should be absolutely free from ambiguity. It should be so clear that he who runs may read, else it will be a pitfall, leading innocent men frequently into trouble of which they have no conception, and who in committing the acts for which they are called to account may have been prompted by the most worthy motives.

I think, Mr. President—waiving, for the time being, the question of the power of Congress to enact such a measure—that this subdivision should be clarified; that it should be simplified; that it should be made specific; and all of these elements, as far as I am able to ascertain, are absent from it.

In the first place, the President is given absolute power to make any regulation he may see fit in time of war under this proviso; and those regulations, however drastic they may be, will have all the force of a criminal statute—have more force than the average criminal statute—because of the extent to which his authority may go, and because of the severe character of the penalty which the citizen incurs in violating or disregarding them.

> Whoever * * * shall collect, record, publish, or communicate, or attempt to elicit any information—
> With respect to certain things—
> or with respect to the plans or conduct or supposed plans or conduct of any naval or military operations—

Shall be subjected to the penalties of this law. That is to say, if one seeks to elicit information regarding plans which are actual or supposititious, his liability is the same. He may merely imagine the existence of a plan and proceed to elicit information concerning it, and yet his offense under this act may be quite as substantial and quite as serious as though he actually ascertained the character of plans with a design of communicating them to the enemy.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. WALSH. For the information of the Senator from Colorado, I read from the draft which the metropolitan papers of New York prepared, to show the Senator what they thought would be quite appropriate in the way of legislation on this subject.

Section 2 of their draft is as follows:

> That when a state of war exists the President may prohibit the publication or dissemination within the United States, continental and insular, of any and all information, facts, rumors, or speculations referring to the armed forces of the Government, materials or implements of war, or the military means and measures that may be contemplated for the defense of the country, except when such publication or dissemination shall have been duly authorized, and he may issue such regulations as may be necessary to render such prohibition effective.

I referred heretofore to this draft, Mr. President, said to have been agreed upon by the New York newspapers, and if the Senator does not object, I should like to have it incorporated in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no objection, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TENTATIVE CENSORSHIP BILL AGREED UPON BY NEW YORK NEWSPAPERS.

Be it enacted, etc., That when a state of war exists the President may prohibit the use of the mails, cables, telegraphs, or other means of communication for the transmission to any foreign country of information that may be of value to the enemies of the United States, and that he may issue such regulations as may be necessary to render such prohibition effective.

SEC. 2. That when a state of war exists the President may prohibit the publication or dissemination within the United States, continental and insular, of any and all information, facts, rumors, or speculations referring to the armed forces of the Government, materials or implements of war, or the military means and measures that may be contemplated for the defense of the country, except when such publication or dissemination shall have been duly authorized, and he may issue such regulations as may be necessary to render such prohibition effective.

SEC. 3. That as to daily newspapers, the regulations prescribed by the President shall be administered by a central board of censors to be appointed by the President, composed of a representative of the War Department, a representative of the Navy Department, and a representative of the newspaper press with such subordinate boards of like composition in localities deemed necessary by the President. That such central board, and subject to its directions such subordinate boards, shall have power to enforce the regulations prescribed by the President; and to prevent unnecessary delay in the distribution of authorized information to the public; and to appoint and employ such clerical assistants as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section at such compensation as may be designated by the President. But the War and Navy Department members of central board and of such subordinate boards shall act without extra compensation; the compensation, if any, of the press members of these boards shall be paid by the newspapers.

SEC. 4. That after the President shall have issued such regulations as authorized by sections 1 and 2 of this act, it shall be unlawful for any person or corporation or any officer, director, or agent of a corporation in his capacity as such within the jurisdiction of the United States to publish, or disseminate, or cause, or procure, or through willful negligence permit to be published or disseminated, any information, facts, rumors, or speculations prohibited by the terms of this act, and any person who offends may be punished by a fine of not more than $——— or by a term of imprisonment of not more than —— years, or both. Any corporation which so offends shall be punished by a fine of not more than $———. Any officer, director, or agent of any corporation who shall consent to, connive at, or through willful negligence permit any violation of the provisions of this act by such corporation or by any of its agents or agencies shall be punished by a fine of not more than $——— or by a term of imprisonment of not more than —— years, or both.

SEC. 5. That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives or the publication of the same, provided no discussion, comment, or criticism shall convey information prohibited under the provisions of this section.

SEC. 6. That the regulations and the pains and penalties authorized by this act shall continue only during the existence of a state of war and shall cease to be operative with the cessation of military operation, except for pains and penalties for violations thereof committed prior to the cessation of military operations.

Mr. THOMAS. The draft from which the Senator has just read is, I think, from the information I gather by merely hearing it once, preferable to the proposed law; but, in my judgment, Mr. President, the power to prohibit under severe penalties the publication of any and everything except that which the Chief Magistrate at the time may deem to be safe and proper is of itself the delegation of an authority which might easily be exercised—not by the present President, not by his successor, perhaps, but which might be easily exercised—in such a way as to virtually prohibit that freedom of the press which is the foundation of all free government.

However, I think it is a fair inference from the text of this proposed measure that its violation is as complete when information regarding some supposed plan is sought to be elicited as when information regarding some actual plan is sought to be elicited, and that enters into the field, and very widely into the field, of inquiry; so widely that if the representative of a daily newspaper, or a Member of the United States Senate, or any citizen engaged in any other capacity should at any time innocently or otherwise have the temerity to elicit information regarding the truth or falsity of something about which he has heard, if it is a supposed plan of conduct of any military or naval operation, he at once becomes subject to the terms and conditions of this penal statute and liable to be punished accordingly.

Mr. President, that is not justice; that is not law; that is not liberty; that is the suppression of every field of legitimate inquiry in time of war. It might be construed with the best of intentions as involving a violation of a criminal statute designed for the preservation of the country in a time of great emergency. Surely an expression of that kind should not go into a statute, and especially now, when we are acting upon a subject of far-reaching importance, without due deliberation.

Why, Mr. President, I do not think it is too much to say that this is one of the most important measures that the Senate of the United States at any time was ever called upon to consider; and yet hearing the discussion there are not a score of Senators, and I have noticed that since the bill became the unfinished business but few Senators have been present either to take part in the discussion or to listen to it, yet it embraces and affects fundamental principles which have been the subject of contention by the Anglo-Saxon race for centuries, and established through the struggles and the sacrifice of generations.

It strikes directly at the freedom of the press, at the constitutional exemption from unreasonable search and seizure, not to mention other provisions so sacred to the Anglo-Saxon race that they should not be modified or imperiled, however great the exigency, except upon the most serious, far-reaching, and extended consideration. Yet we are going ahead with this as a war measure, although when enacted it will be permanent in its operation; and I very much fear that with the best of intention we may place upon the statute books something that will rise to plague us in the immediate future.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been somewhat disturbed in glancing over this bill, and am much interested in what the Senator from Colorado is saying. Will the Senator yield that I may ask for a quorum? I think more Senators ought to be here.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator desires to ask for a quorum on his own account, yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. But the Senator knows as well as I do what the result of calling for a quorum is. The Senators will simply come in and answer to their names and go out again.

Mr. GALLINGER. We might keep a few in addition to those who are now here. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRAMMELL in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Hitchcock	Myers	Smoot
Calder	Hughes	Nelson	Sterling
Colt	James	New	Sutherland
Culberson	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Swanson
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Thomas
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Owen	Thompson
Fall	Jones, Wash.	Page	Townsend
Fernald	Kellogg	Penrose	Trammell
Fletcher	Kendrick	Pittman	Wadsworth
France	King	Poindexter	Walsh
Frelinghuysen	Kirby	Pomerene	Watson
Gallinger	Knox	Ransdell	Weeks
Gronna	La Follette	Shafroth	Wolcott
Hale	Lodge	Sheppard
Harding	McKellar	Smith, Ga.
Hardwick	McLean	Smith, S. C.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to state that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MARTIN] is detained from the Senate on account of illness in his family. I desire this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. THOMAS. The junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is absent from the Chamber on official business.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have been requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] on account of official business, the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] on account of official business, and the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], and the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, continuing the line of discussion at the time the quorum was called, I want to emphasize the number of probable offenses which can be committed under this bill if it becomes a law: The collection of information upon plans, real or supposed; the record of information upon plans, real or supposed; their publication, their communication; attempts to elicit this information with respect to movement, numbers, to description, to condition, to disposition of armed forces, of ships, of aircraft, of war materials of the United States.

Now, those are specific, and so far you can put your finger upon the evils aimed at; but the subsection is also applicable with respect to supplies, plans, or conduct of any naval or any military operation or with respect to any works or measures undertaken by or connected with or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information—no limitation whatever being placed upon its operation—relating to the public defense, calculated to be, or which might be useful to the enemy, whether the enemy ever receives it or not, and these are as grave and shall be punished precisely as the other enumerated offenses.

Mr. President, is it possible that we are to impose upon the citizens of the United States—upon all of them—a list of offenses punishable by large fines and long terms of imprisonment, including that of eliciting information concerning supposed plans or any possible information which might be useful to the enemy? If so, who is to determine the fact of contingent or possible usefulness—the court, the jury, or the President in his regulation to be made hereunder? By what process of judicial procedure is a man to be convicted of the offense of eliciting information upon something which as a matter of speculation might be valuable to an enemy? Are we not proceeding, Mr. President, not only beyond all reason, but beyond all possible authority that a legislative body in a country like this ought to possess?

I always have the greatest respect for the legal opinions of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. He never expressed one that was not the result of careful examination. He tells us that the Supreme Court of the United States has, in a recent decision, sustained the proposition that Congress may delegate to the executive arm of the Government the power to make regulations having all the force and effect of criminal statutes.

But, Mr. President, there must be a limitation to this, and if it does not exist in such broad, general, comprehensive and ambiguous prohibitions as those to which I am calling attention, then it is impossible to conceive any limitation upon the power of Congress to delegate authority to the President, and the power of the President under that delegation to make even the thoughts of men criminal and to transform acts which are perfectly innocent and perfectly legitimate into crimes and offenses, resulting in wresting his property and his liberty from the citizen.

Now, if that is so, and I can reach no other conclusion in the consideration of this matter, I want to know which is best, the despotism of Germany, which we are to-day, in common with the other nations of the earth, engaged in destroying, or the greater despotism in a free republic which a law of this kind, enacted in a period of stress and excitement, will impose upon the American people.

I protest, Mr. President, against the enactment of any criminal law that is not specific, that is not definite and does not enable the citizen to place his finger upon and by understanding regulate his course of action accordingly. I protest against any statute so broad and far-reaching in its character as to give to the courts and the Executive of the country absolute power over the liberty of the citizen. I can conceive of no information of any sort or description in a time of excitement which a man may elicit or seek to elicit which can not by his personal enemy be tortured into evidence of and given some sinister direction whereby the common enemy might be supposed to benefit if the information had reached him, and this constitutes a crime under this bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator think that under this phraseology if a reporter visited the War Department and asked the Secretary of War certain questions relating to the proposed order of troops or movement of troops——

Mr. THOMAS. Proposed or supposed?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Even if the Secretary of War refused to give him the information, would that reporter be committing a crime?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; he would be attempting to elicit information. He would have committed a crime by making inquiries. What I mean is that the President's order and regulation which he is authorized here to make may easily be extended to cover just that thing. Further, the Senator is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate. It can be extended so as to make it an offense upon his part as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs to seek to elicit information about something the authorities might determine to be valuable to a public enemy.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. The question addressed to the Senator from Colorado by the Senator from Nebraska is a very striking one and an important one. Of course, it is too bad to subject a reporter proceeding upon such a mission as that to punishment, or the Secretary of War, but I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado now what he would do in a case of that character? We assume, now, a reporter, a very enterprising young man who is desirous of making a "scoop," gets into the War Department in some way or other for the purpose of obtaining some advance information about an important military movement. He seeks to elicit that information for the purpose of publishing it in his newspaper before anybody else can get hold of it. It is of immense importance to the enemy. I ask what would you do in a case of that character?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has narrowed my phraseology. I agree entirely with what the Senator from Colorado says, that this language is so broad that a man upon a perfectly innocent errand, asking a perfectly legitimate question of the Secretary of War concerning the disposition of troops already made, would, if the Secretary of War said, "I decline to give you any information," nevertheless have committed an offense in merely seeking to elicit the information.

Mr. WALSH. Quite right, Mr. President. Let me say it is a fact that this provision is so broad that it will undoubtedly subject to some inconvenience and some discomfort a great many citizens of the United States who are doing a very proper thing. But why condemn the entire statute? Why do not the gentlemen who criticize this language suggest the appropriate limitation to reach the reprehensible case and to exclude the others? The committee have done the best they could do.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the committee have endeavored to meet this situation by recommending what in their judgment is an appropriate scheme of legislation. I know they have worked long and carefully and thoughtfully and anxiously upon the many problems which are involved in this bill. I am not criticizing their motives or their purposes; I am merely calling attention to the existence of what seem to be the many dangers in the bill they have reported, with a view of correcting it if possible.

Mr. COLT. I want to ask the Senator if he does not think we have to rely in a measure, in a statute of this kind where it is impossible to go into particulars, upon the wisdom and discretion of the President? This section of the bill expressly provides that the President shall prescribe the regulations which shall constitute violations of this statute, and hence the whole power of regulation resides in the President. In other words, I would ask the Senator if we can not trust the President in this matter?

Mr. THOMAS. Most assuredly, Mr. President.

Mr. COLT. And especially in a war measure of this kind?

Mr. THOMAS. Most assuredly.

Mr. COLT. We have in a large measure to rely on the President. And right here let me say that there are certain restraints upon the Chief Executive. One restraint is his character; another restraint is public opinion. And might I further say to the Senator that these great restraints which I have mentioned are the only restraints underlying legislation by the British Parliament and the only restraints underlying legislation in many constitutional governments.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, my remarks are entirely impersonal. I have the most unbounded confidence in the judgment of the President of the United States, and I am not even indirectly criticizing him; but we must remember this is a statute which is supposed to be a permanent enactment, and while it is enough——

Mr. COLT. Only for the war.

Mr. THOMAS. No; I say permanent. I find nothing in the bill limiting it to the war.

Mr. KING. Look at subdivision (c), "whenever, in time of war."

Mr. THOMAS. It is not confined to this war; it does not expire with the declaration of peace between the United States and Germany.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is only in time of war.

Mr. THOMAS. It is only in time of war that these great constitutional limitations upon despotism are put to the test. It is precisely then that they are useful. They have no particular moment in times of quiet when the minds of men are diverted to the pursuits of peace, when prosperity and happiness smile over the land. It is only on occasions like this when they become effective and their value is priceless. Consequently, it is at such times that we must see to it that they are preserved, lest when peace does return we shall realize that some of the most important safeguards of liberty have been swept away in the torrent of the conflict.

Mr. President, it is true, as asked by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], that we must impose a vast amount of authority upon the Chief Executive. I am in favor of it. But here we give him a series of subjects upon which he can exercise authority practically without limit, and while the President promulgates the regulations he does not enforce or execute them. They are executed in his name, if you please, but they are executed nevertheless by that vast body of employees which constitute the machinery of government both in times of peace and war; and we know how easy it is for a man from sinister motives, from a desire of revenge, and some other dark element of human nature which men are prone in times like these to indulge to take advantage of such statutes to use them as their opportunity to obtain satisfaction from their fellows. In other words, we may be forging weapons whereby the baser elements of mankind may, under the guise of patriotism, utilize them for the injury and the undoing of their fellow citizens.

Now, it is true, as the Senator asserts, that the two fundamental forces in this and in other free governments are character and public opinion. That sense of responsibility which men invested with large powers necessarily feel and which, of course, modifies, or should modify, their conduct upon all matters, rests largely upon the regulative force of public sentiment; but if I read this section correctly, that public opinion which is fundamentally based upon public discussions, which in these days find their expression through the machinery of the public press, is virtually suppressed by it. The papers can not criticize, can not express their opinions or call the attention of the public to matters of the gravest concern without subjecting themselves to all the pains and penalties provided for in this subdivision. If that is the case, and if in its practical operation it should so result, then one of the checks upon the exercise of absolute power will be largely minimized.

Now, let us see what this is:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same.

Let us suppose that this bill becomes a law, and that under its provisions the President makes certain regulations, as he would be authorized to do by the recitals of subdivision (c) in order to make it operative. The press comments upon, discusses, and criticizes these regulations. It calls attention to many things concerning them which perhaps had not been called to the attention of the President. It may, because ours is the most intelligent and enterprising press in the world, be able to reveal many defects in the regulations which should be changed. But it is provided that no discussion, comment, or criticism shall convey information prohibited under the provisions of this section. Such criticism might be useful to the enemy, and the very moment it is determined by the authorities that that is so indictment follows. What then becomes of the first proviso, which is designed to give to the press liberty of a certain character and up to a certain point to criticize acts and policies? Mr. President, I can not conceive how a newspaper can criticize acts and policies without running directly counter to the second proviso and conveying information prohibited under the terms of subdivision (c). If that is true, then it must follow that criticism of anything else connected with the affairs of the Government must also be contained within the purview of this proposed section.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. HUGHES. My understanding is that the committee are willing to accept the amendment proposed to strike out the second proviso. If that is correct——

Mr. OVERMAN. We are willing that the second proviso shall be stricken out.

Mr. LODGE. I moved to strike it out.

Mr. THOMAS. If the second proviso is stricken out—I was not aware that the committee had so stated—then I must, of course, modify the criticism which I have just made.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to call the Senator's attention to something else. With the second proviso stricken out, the language of the proviso as it is left brings in practically the language suggested by the so-called tentative bill put forward by the newspapers. So they do not seem to be in fear of any drastic features of the law as set out in that proviso. They seem to think that they can operate under the language of that proviso if the second proviso is stricken out.

Mr. THOMAS. It may be that that is the consensus of opinion on the part of the press, but I nevertheless am of the opinion that they are consenting to much more than they would consent to if they gave a little more careful consideration to the entire purview of the bill and particularly to that part of the bill which deals with the United States mail.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. It ought to be remembered in connection with the suggestion just made by the Senator from New Jersey that in the proposal of the newspapers, in so far as prohibitions are concerned, they are not similar at all to the prohibitions contained in this chapter.

Mr. HUGHES. Are they not fully as broad, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think not.

Mr. HUGHES. I was impressed——

Mr. CUMMINS. I heard the proposal read before the committee. I had not before me a copy of the paper, but, as I recall it, it is not comparable with the bill that has been reported, so far as inhibitions or prohibitions are concerned.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator will find that the general consensus of opinion is that they were more drastic even than these.

Mr. CUMMINS. I heard that said by one of the members of the committee, but I did not concur in that estimate of the paper. The entire question, however, could be relieved of any doubt if the Senator from North Carolina or the Senator from Montana would produce the paper and put it before the Senate.

Mr. HUGHES. I will say to the Senator that the paper was sent up by the Senator from Montana to be printed. It is now in the hands of the official reporters and has been sent for.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well. We will have it to-morrow then, I understand, before the consideration of this chapter is concluded; but I ask the Senator from Colorado whether he, as one of the guardians of the institutions of the United States, will be willing to allow the newspapers to write the law of the country for them?

Mr. THOMAS. No; Mr. President, I have great admiration for the press. I am a thorough believer in the freedom of the press. I know that freedom has been abused. It must be abused in countries like this. I think I have suffered personally as much from the unrestrained operation of a free press as any Member of this body during my comparatively short career in public life. It has accused me of everything except corpulency. My lack of it has also been frequently exaggerated. But, Mr. President, press outrages on individuals, although grievous and exasperating, are of no consequence beside the inestimable value of an untrammeled and an enlightened press.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield in just a moment. I would put no restriction whatever upon the American press which is not absolutely necessary for the security and salvation of the Republic. Once the press is invaded there may be an end to that healthy public opinion which is the basis of democratic institutions. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the proviso with reference to the publication relieves the paragraph from the criticism which the Senator has been making, because the paragraph reads those who "collect" or who "record," or who even "attempt to elicit." If I should find out from the Senator from Iowa something that he happened to know, and if it were a matter communicated to the enemy and might be of service——

Mr. THOMAS. You do not have to communicate it to the enemy in order to commit the offense.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I do not have to communicate it. I say if that matter is communicated to the enemy in some other way, entirely disconnected from my inquiry of the Senator from Iowa, when neither of us dreamed of communicating it and neither of us ever repeated it, if it were repeated in any way to the enemy and could be of any service to them, then my private inquiry of the Senator from Iowa would subject me to going to the penitentiary for 10 years.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator has anticipated what I was about to say, and he has said it so much better than I can, that I am relieved from the necessity of repeating it.

I want to add, however, that if this first proviso with the elimination of the second becomes the law and does give to the press any degree of freedom to discuss public matters, then the members of the press are exempted from the operation of a statute which embraces everybody else, and the man who represents a newspaper may discuss things publicly which if I inquire about privately might send me to the penitentiary. That would be neither law nor justice.

The section creates a conglomeration of offenses having due regard to and including everybody within the range of them. If it then shall exempt this very influential body of our citizens from its general operation, that of itself, even if the proviso were more specific and limited than it is, would be subject, in my judgment, to the very serious criticism that it operated unequally.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I feel toward the newspapers just as was expressed a moment ago by the Senator from Colorado. They seem to me nowadays to be careless of the truth and indifferent about it. Nevertheless I desire to protect them.

For instance, I took occasion yesterday to express my opinion of the $3,000,000,000 provided for in the bond bill that instead of being loaned to the allies it should be given to the allies, and I was exploited this morning as an enemy to the sentiment or desire on the part of the people of this country to prosecute the war with diligence and with energy. I instance that simply to indicate how far from the truth they occasionally travel. But notwithstanding that I am hoping for some reform on the part of the newspapers some of these days.

Mr. THOMAS. They will eulogize you when you pass into the great beyond.

Mr. CUMMINS. However, if the next generation can see papers that are disposed to tell the truth now and then, I shall be entirely satisfied.

But the effect of this proviso in behalf of the newspapers is not so broad as has been suggested. It does not relieve the newspapers and leave the entire burden upon the individual. I call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to this view of it. They are permitted to discuss, to comment upon, and to criticize the acts or policies of the Government, but the paragraph itself proposes that, under the direction of the President, there may be prohibited any publication which relates to the description of troops, the condition of troops, and many other things of that kind, which could not by any stretch of the imagination be called either an act of the Government or a policy of the Government.

This would cover the discussion with regard to our preparedness upon the Mexican border if it happened that we had declared the truth and said that we were at war with Mexico. It would not have permitted the newspapers to describe the condition of the National Guard, which they did so graphically and, I believe, with good results, now and then. It would not permit them to describe anything that pertained to the national defense. These things can not be called either acts of the Government or policies of the Government.

I desired that the Senator from Colorado, in commenting upon this particular part of the bill, should have my idea of its real construction.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] for his suggestions. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] made the suggestion, in passing just now, that is also very apropos, that the newspapers would under this section commit a crime if they discovered and published the fact that rotten meat was being fed to our soldiers, or that they were short in their munition supply, or that some serious cause of dissatisfaction existed which might ripen into mutiny.

I tell you, Mr. President, that a free press at a time like this is more beneficial than injurious to a people like ours. It is not the press so much as other agencies which betray the secrets of this Government. Let me call your attention to a telegram which was published in the New York World on the 23d day of February last:

BETRAY UNITED STATES NAVAL SECRETS TO FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS—ADMIRAL GRIFFIN TELLS SECRETARY DANIELS PROSPECTIVE CONTRACTORS FOR AMERICAN WARSHIPS DIVULGE DETAILS OF PLANS FURNISHED THEM AS BASIS FOR BIDS.

[Special to the World.]

WASHINGTON, February 22.

As a result of the controversy which the Navy Department had had with Charles Curtis concerning the wisdom of using the electric drive in the new battle cruisers, Rear Admiral Griffin, Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, has charged that it is impossible for the Navy to keep secrets, because American shipbuilding companies divulge the contents of the plans given to them for estimating purposes. Here is the statement which Admiral Griffin has made to Secretary Daniels and the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs:

"Any hope of the United States being able to steal a march on foreign navies, as matters now stand, seems futile. We have long since been forced to believe that it is a practical impossibility to keep secret any of our undertakings.

"Experience with the design of the battle cruisers has proved beyond question of doubt that some of the American engineers and shipbuilders to whom these plans were sent in confidence are not worthy of the trust that was imposed in them.

"Despite their frequent protestations of patriotism, I am convinced that some of these men may be depended upon to keep foreign governments fully informed regarding naval secrets that come into their possession."

Admiral Griffin added that within a week after the plans for the battle cruisers were sent out to prospective bidders last fall a man came to see him in Washington who was not a shipbuilder, engineer, or subcontractor for any of the companies to whom the plans had been sent, nor in any sense one who was entitled to know anything concerning the detailed designs and drawings for the ships.

"I was perfectly aghast," continued the admiral, "to find that this man, who wanted to suggest some change in design, appeared to be in possession of intimate knowledge concerning the plans. When I requested to be informed as to how he came to know about these matters he simply said that he had been told about them."

Admiral Griffin said he was surprised to see an article in a London engineering magazine discussing with considerable familiarity various novel features of construction called for in the plans of the battle cruisers.

I very much fear, Mr. President, that if this subdivision is enacted into law, and a newspaper should publish information such as I have just read, it will subject itself to fine and imprisonment for violating the espionage laws of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. Just a moment. It is, of course, desirable to reach and to punish men who, as here outlined, have no scruples whatever about securing and betraying the secrets of the Government; but do not pass a statute under which a nation may be indicted upon the theory that men may otherwise possibly acquire or collect or elicit information tending to benefit the enemies of this Government. Now I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I am very sure the Senator from Colorado desires that the discussion of this subject should be considered seriously. I should like to ask him under which provision of this bill one would be made punishable who gave information to the effect that soldiers of the Army were being furnished with rotten meat?

Mr. THOMAS. If that were the fact, it would be welcome news and beneficial news to the enemy, would it not?

Mr. WALSH. I do not see how.

Mr. THOMAS. You do not think it would?

Mr. WALSH. No.

Mr. THOMAS. That we were having our soldiers fight upon provisions that would necessarily breed disease, emasculate their vigor and energy, and diminish their numbers? I think that would be the most vital information imaginable.

Mr. WALSH. I think that would be quite too small.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator may be right; but, Mr. President, I seriously contend that under the recitals of this subdivision such and similar matters if inquired about or if information were collected regarding them—and they might be useful to the enemy, as I think they would be—would subject those so offending to the penalties of this provision.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. Perhaps I misunderstand the Senator's position, and if I do I should like to be corrected; but, as I understand, his position is that we need no legislation on this subject.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not say so.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, does the Senator think we need any?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then, will the Senator sit down to-night and try to write something?

Mr. THOMAS. I will do my best.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think several others have tried it, and every time they have tried it they have come back to this provision.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I know that it is easier to criticize than it is to construct; I am thoroughly aware of the effort which the Senator from North Carolina and his colleagues have made, earnestly and faithfully and patriotically, to frame and bring a bill here which would be acceptable. I hope neither the Senator nor any of his colleagues on the committee will imagine for a moment that I am doing otherwise than attempting to portray the probable consequences of an enactment which they have brought here. I would rather see no law at all—I will say that frankly—I would rather take my chances under existing conditions, than to see a statute like this enacted by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has done the very best he could, and I really think he has produced a wonderful code. Most of it is so obviously right that no one either criticizes it or suggests an amendment to it. As an instance of that I will say to the Senator from Colorado that there is another clause in this bill which covers precisely the case which the newspaper article mentions. I refer to paragraph (d) in the same chapter. It is in section 1, page 6, and is as follows:

Whoever, lawfully or unlawfully having possession of, access to, control over, or being intrusted with any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, photographic negative, blue print, plan, model, instrument, appliance, or note relating to the national defense, willfully communicates or transmits or attempts to communicate or transmit the same to any person not lawfully entitled to receive it—

He is punishable.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, Mr. President, I have no doubt that the bill, taken as a whole, is a most excellent bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not criticizing what the Senator from Colorado said——

Mr. THOMAS. I understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am simply saying that these cases that we all want punished or dealt with are dealt with in other parts of this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. Well, Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator from Iowa for the suggestions which he has made. They are all very pertinent and illuminating. I will cheerfully comply with the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina and endeavor—although I may find my task quite as impossible as I think he has found it—to suggest something in the morning which may be considered not, perhaps, as a substitute for but in connection with the part of the bill to which my remarks are directed. Now, Mr. President, let me refer to history for a moment. Something over a hundred years ago the Nation was confronted with a crisis very similar to the one which has here resulted in a declaration of war.

Our relations with Great Britain and with France were strained to the breaking point. The rights of neutrals then, as now, were being constantly violated, with the neutrals as the principal sufferers. Congress during the administration of the first Adams proceeded to meet the emergency by a series of enactments, known to history as the alien and sedition laws. They were confronted as much with a condition, instead of a theory, as we now are. Upon the 18th of June, 1798, Congress amended the law regarding naturalization; they amended it again on the 25th of June, and still later upon the 6th of July. They provided, among other things, for the deportation of any alien whose presence, in the opinion of the President of the United States, was dangerous to the peace and safety of the United States. At that time the country was filled with refugees from France who were bitterly hostile to the Government of Great Britain, and who doubtless were engaged in many conspiracies within our borders for the undoing of that country. We then also had a press to deal with. On the 14th day of July, 1798, the celebrated sedition law was enacted, which provided, among other things:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall write, print, utter, or publish, or shall cause or procure to be written, printed, uttered, or published, or shall knowingly and willingly assist or aid in writing, printing, uttering, or publishing, any false, scandalous, and malicious writing or writings against the Government of the United States, or either House of the Congress of the United States, or the President of the United States, with intent to defame the said Government, or either House of the said Congress, or the said President, or to bring them, or either of them, into contempt or disrepute; or to excite against them, or either or any of them, the hatred of the good people of the United States, or to stir up sedition within the United States, or to excite any unlawful combinations therein for opposing or resisting any law of the United States, or any act of the President of the United States done in pursuance of any such law, or of the powers in him vested by the Constitution of the United States, or to resist, oppose, or defeat any such law or act, or to aid, encourage, or abet any hostile designs of any foreign nation against the United States, their people, or Government, then such person, being thereof convicted before any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $2,000 and by imprisonment not exceeding two years.

That statute had the advantage of the bill which I am discussing, in that it was much more specific, much more definite, and, therefore, much more easily understandable. Its penalties, moreover, were much milder than those now in issue. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the Congress in enacting that statute felt, just as this Congress does as to the pending measure, that it was absolutely essential for the protection and preservation of the Union; but the people thought differently. When the people were confronted with that statute and with the possible perversion of it to political and personal ends, they rose en masse, and they not only defeated, but they crucified the party which was responsible for its enactment. From that day to this "alien and sedition laws" have been a term of reproach in American history. Yet those laws were mild; those laws were democratic when compared and contrasted with the recitals of subdivision (c) of this section of the pending bill; and I believe that any Congress which will enact such a measure at this or any other crisis will have to answer for it at the same bar of public opinion, and that it will receive, although I do not for a moment assert that it would merit, a similar fate.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I merely desire to ask how long the sedition law, as it was known, remained on the statute books?

Mr. THOMAS. It was enacted in 1798, and, I think, by its terms it was to expire in 1801; but before it had expired, Thomas Jefferson was elected President of the United States, largely upon the issue made by the enactment of that legislation by the Federalist Party.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Had peace in any manner come in the meantime?

Mr. THOMAS. No; peace had not in any manner come in the meantime; on the contrary, the Napoleonic wars, as the Senator will recollect, continued down to 1815, and all through Mr. Jefferson's administration there was constant friction, which threatened to engulf us at any time in war with France or with England or with both.

Mr. President, I have spoken longer than I intended. I know that this proviso will go over until to-morrow, at the request of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], but I deemed this an opportune time to give my views upon this specific part of the bill, inasmuch as it had come up for discussion and had been advocated so ably and so intelligently by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. This subdivision we can not afford to enact. It will create a crisis much more serious than that which it is designed to meet, and, in my judgment, it will very seriously interfere with, if it does not directly conflict with, those fundamental amendments to our Constitution regarding the freedom of the press and the rights of the citizen.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I have agreed with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that this section may go over. I will therefore ask that the Secretary proceed with the reading of the remaining sections of the chapter. I do not think there is any objection to them. When we finish the reading of the chapter I will ask that the whole chapter go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). The Secretary will resume the reading.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in Chapter II, section 3, page 9, line 23, after the words "United States," to insert "to the injury of the service or of the United States"; in line 24, after the word "not," to strike out "less" and insert "more"; and in line 25, after the word "years," to strike out "or for life," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. Whoever in time of war shall willfully make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States or to promote the success of their enemies, and whoever in time of war shall willfully cause or attempt to cause disaffection in the military or naval forces of the United States to the injury of the service or of the United States shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than 20 years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in section 6, Chapter II, page 11, line 3, after the word "departments," to strike out "or of other Government offices," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. The President of the United States shall have power in time of war or in case of national emergency to designate any place other than those set forth in paragraph (a) of section 1 hereof in which anything for the use of the Army or Navy is being prepared or constructed or stored as a prohibited place for the purposes of this chapter on the ground that information with respect thereto would be prejudicial to the national defense; he shall further have the power, on the aforesaid ground, in time of war or in case of national emergency to designate any matter, thing, or information belonging to the Government, or contained in the records or files of any of the executive departments, as information relating to the national defense, to which no person unless duly authorized shall be lawfully entitled within the meaning of this chapter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in section 8, Chapter II, page 11, line 13, before the word "forfeitures," to insert "all," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 8. All offenses committed and all forfeitures or liabilities incurred prior to the taking effect hereof under any law embraced in or changed, modified, or repealed by this chapter may be prosecuted and punished in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary concluded the reading of Chapter II.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that Chapter II be passed over temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in section 1, Chapter III, page 12, line 16, after the word "nations," to insert "or to any vessel of the United States as defined in section 310 of the act of March 4, 1909, entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States,'" so as to make the section read:

SECTION 1. Whoever shall set fire to any vessel of foreign registry, or any vessel of American registry entitled to engage in commerce with foreign nations, or to any vessel of the United States as defined in section 310 of the act of March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," or to the cargo of the same, or shall tamper with the motive power or instrumentalities of navigation of such vessel, or shall place bombs or explosives in or upon such vessel, or shall do any other act to or upon such vessel while within the jurisdiction of the United States, or, if such vessel is of American registry, while she is on the high seas, with intent to injure or endanger the safety of the vessel or of her cargo, or of persons on board, whether the injury or danger is so intended to take place within the jurisdiction of the United States, or after the vessel shall have departed therefrom; or whoever shall attempt or conspire to do any such acts with such intent, shall be fined not more than $10,000 and imprisoned not more than 10 years.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator having charge of the bill whether it would not be well to insert another section subjecting all persons who commit any of the acts mentioned in section 1, which result in the loss of human life, to indictment and punishment for murder?

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator desire to punish by death those guilty under the section?

Mr. THOMAS. It occurred to me that if lives are lost as the result of any of the acts mentioned in section 1 the perpetrators of those acts should be indicted and punished for murder.

Mr. OVERMAN. I rather think so myself, but the committee thought this was sufficient punishment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Colorado that the general statute, as I understand, would cover the crime of homicide under such circumstances?

Mr. THOMAS. It is possible that some provision of the Criminal Code would cover just such a case; but if that is so, it is remarkable that it does not also punish the attempt to commit it.

Mr. KING. I think that the Criminal Code covers the case to which the Senator from Colorado refers, and this section is supplemental legislation and directed to another matter which did not heretofore, perhaps, constitute a substantive offense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any amendments to be offered to Chapter III?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think we might adopt it unless the Senator from Colorado desires to offer an amendment. I will inquire if the Senator wishes to have the chapter passed over temporarily?

Mr. THOMAS. I have no objection to it, Mr. President. I can recur to it later if necessary.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then, I ask that the chapter be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Chapter III, as amended, is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in Chapter IV, line 11, before the word "whoever," to insert the words "Section 1," so as to read:

CHAPTER IV.

INTERFERENCE WITH FOREIGN COMMERCE BY VIOLENT MEANS.

SECTION 1. Whoever shall willfully prevent, interfere with, or obstruct or attempt to prevent, interfere with, or obstruct the exportation to foreign countries of articles from the United States by injuring or destroying, by fire or explosives, such articles or the places where they are produced or stored, shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any further amendments to Chapter IV?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, my attention has been called by my secretary to the fact that, in line 14, after the word "destroying," there is an amendment proposing to insert a comma, and after the word "explosives," in line 15, there is a similar amendment. Those are matters of punctuation, but I ask that the amendment be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that commas appear after the words indicated by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. The original bill as introduced did not have commas, and therefore the commas have been put in as an amendment to the original bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to, and, without objection, Chapter IV, as amended, is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to section 10, Chapter V.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator from North Carolina. I want to inquire of him whether the forfeiture of the cargo, as provided for by section 7, ought to be incurred? The Senator will remember that the same question presented itself to us in connection with another provision of the bill. He will observe that section 6 provides that whenever it appears that a vessel is not entitled to a clearance, and a clearance is refused, and notwithstanding that the vessel starts from the port, it is made punishable by the next section——

Mr. OVERMAN. I remember very well the amendment we made to this section.

Mr. WALSH. And the master ought to be punished, of course, and the vessel ought to be forfeited; but here is a cargo aboard that belongs to some one who is in no manner chargeable with the unlawful act of the master of the ship. I think it could not have been intended that the cargo should be forfeited in a case of that character. I ask the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to that feature of the bill, if he can give it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I remember that we struck it out in the other case; and having been stricken out in that case it seems to me that it ought to be stricken out in this, so far as I can see at present.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Montana whether it was not understood that this should be amended by inserting the word "contraband"?

Mr. WALSH. That was done in another section. That met the case of munitions that were about to be exported in a vessel contrary to the law. We made a provision that the vessel should be forfeited with all her tackle and apparel and furniture; and the bill as originally drawn provided that her cargo should likewise be forfeited. We provided that only her forbidden cargo should be forfeited, and I think a similar provision should be made in this section.

I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that we regard section 7 as having been passed over.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let this be passed over for the present, Mr. President.

The reading of Chapter V was resumed and concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN. Sections 7 and 8 of this chapter are to be passed over at the request of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I ask that the whole chapter be passed over temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Chapter V will be passed over.

The Secretary proceeded to read Chapter VI.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 21, line 9, after the word "war," to insert "or other articles the export of which is made unlawful by or under any statute"; in line 13, after the word "war," to insert "or other articles the export of which is made unlawful"; and in line 23, after the word "war," to insert "or other forbidden property," so as to make the section read:

SECTION 1. Whenever, under any authority vested in him by law, the President of the United States, by proclamation or otherwise, shall forbid the shipment or exportation of arms or munitions of war, or other articles the export of which is made unlawful by or under any statute, from the United States to any other country, or whenever there shall be good cause to believe that any arms or munitions of war, or other articles the export of which is made unlawful, are being or are intended to be employed or exported in connection with a military expedition or enterprise forbidden by section 13 of the act approved March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," as herein amended, the several collectors, naval officers, surveyors and inspectors of customs, the marshals and deputy marshals of the United States, and every other person duly authorized for the purpose by the President may seize and detain any arms or munitions of war or other forbidden property about to be so exported or employed, and the vessels or vehicles containing the same, and retain possession thereof until released or disposed of as hereinafter directed. If upon due inquiry, as hereinafter provided, the property seized shall appear to have been about to be so unlawfully exported, used, or employed, the same shall be forfeited to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, on page 24, line 22, after the word "war," to insert "or other articles," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. Except in those cases in which the exportation of arms and munitions of war or other articles is forbidden by proclamation or otherwise by the President, as provided in section 1 of this chapter, nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to, or interfere with, any trade in such commodities, conducted with any foreign port or place wheresoever, or with any other trade which might have been lawfully carried on before the passage of this chapter, under the law of nations, or under the treaties or conventions entered into by the United States, or under the laws thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, on page 25, line 7, after the word "possession," to strike out "of" and insert "or," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. Upon payment of the costs and legal expenses incurred in any such summary trial for possession or libel proceedings, the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to order the release and restoration to the owner or claimant, as the case may be, of any property seized or condemned under the provisions of this chapter.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I move to amend the title of this chapter by adding to it the following:

And other articles intended for export.

Mr. OVERMAN. I accept the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is this Chapter VI or Chapter VII?

Mr. OVERMAN. Chapter VI.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 21, line 5, in the title of the chapter, after the words "Seizures of arms" and before the period, it is proposed to insert "and other articles intended for export."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that the next chapter will probably cause some debate. Therefore I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 19, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 18, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, God over all, we come to Thee in prayer that spirit may meet spirit, be exalted, strengthened, purified, ennobled by the contact. "Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear my voice and open the door I will come in to him and will sup with him and he with Me." Blessed is the man who openeth the door of his heart to the King of Glory; that he may partake with Him of the Bread of Life. Help us to open our hearts to the Heavenly Guest, that we may be prepared for the duties of the new day. In the name of Him who taught us to pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday, April 16, 1917, was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has the certificate of election to Congress from the ninth congressional district of New York of Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH, which seems to be properly signed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the oath of office be administered to Mr. SMITH.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 156) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant leases or licenses for the use of surplus water at the United States Government dam at Lake Winnibigoshish and at Lake Pokegama, in the State of Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a telegram from certain citizens of Rome, N. Y.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the telegram indicated by him. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Oklahoma rise?

Mr. FERRIS. I wanted to make a second request. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD relative to the declaration of policy in the administration of Indian affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a telegram just received from the Des Moines Advertising Club, containing resolutions relative to advertising——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman finish his explanation. I did not get the purport of the resolutions which he wishes to have printed.

Mr. DOWELL. The resolutions are from the Des Moines Advertising Club.

I will ask, for the information of the House, that the Clerk read the resolutions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object. You can not put that over.

Mr. DOWELL. It is relating to advertising subjects relative to floating the Government war bonds.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, every Member of the House is getting telegrams on this war situation, and——

Mr. BARNHART. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana objects, and that is the end of it.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing some resolutions adopted at a patriotic mass meeting at Woodward, Okla.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a change of reference of the bill H. R. 309, from the Committee on Claims to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is it a private bill or a public bill?

Mr. AUSTIN. It is in reference to the enforcement of a treaty between the Government of the United States and the Government of Panama. It is to comply with the treaty obligations between this country and that Government.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R 309) to enable the Secretary of War to pay the amount awarded to the Malambo fire claimants by the joint commission under article 6 of the treaty of November 18, 1903, between the United States and Panama.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to have the bill rereferred from the Committee on Claims to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that belongs to the Committee on Claims. It has been there before.

Mr. AUSTIN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I introduced this bill at the last session of Congress, and it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. FOSTER. If I remember right, it was before the Committee on Claims. It ought to be there anyway.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FOSTER] objects.

Mr. LANGLEY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. There was so much confusion in the Hall I could not understand——

The SPEAKER. Objection was made.

Mr. LANGLEY (continuing). What the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] said. I want to know if the gentleman is going to object hereafter to printing these matters in the RECORD, resolutions, telegrams, and so forth. I have a lot of them I want to insert if it is to be the rule. Among these is a resolution by the Hazard Commercial Club.

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LANGLEY. I am trying to find out what the situation is, and to save time, if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] has given notice he is going to object hereafter.

The SPEAKER. Ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] privately.

Mr. LANGLEY. All right; I will go and see him.

The SPEAKER. Are there any other nominations? If not, the Chair will put the question. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for the election of the list of nominees just read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move the election of the gentleman from Hawaii [Mr. KALANIANAOLE] to the Committees on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, Agriculture, Military Affairs, and Territories.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The motion was agreed to.

REQUESTS FOR EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a statement prepared by the Department of Agriculture on the sweet potato and its uses.

Mr. DOWELL. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa objects.

Mr. PARK. Will not the gentleman from Iowa reserve his objection?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in regard to the revenue.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in regard to the revenue. Is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa objects.

RENT OF BUILDINGS, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The SPEAKER. The last Agricultural appropriation bill contains this proviso about the rent of buildings for the Department of Agriculture:

Provided That a joint committee to be composed of three Members of the Senate, appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Members of the House, appointed by the Speaker of the House, is hereby constituted, who shall investigate the amount of floor space required by the Department of Agriculture for its various activities in the city of Washington, the annual rental now paid by the department, the land available for the erection of Government-owned buildings to meet the needs of the department, together with the cost of erecting the same, and report to Congress not later than the first Monday in December, 1917.

The Chair appoints the following committee: Mr. LEVER, Mr. LEE of Georgia, and Mr. HAUGEN.

EMERGENCY BOND ISSUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 2762, with Senate amendments, and move that the House disagree to the amendments of the Senate and agree to a conference. It is the bond bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2762) to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense and to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves to take from the Speaker's table House bill 2762, the bond bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as conferees on the part of the House Mr. KITCHIN, Mr. RAINEY, Mr. DIXON, Mr. FORDNEY, and Mr. GARDNER.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. FOSTER, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of George W. Irvin, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. BUTLER, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Harry M. Batty, pension bill No. 9719, Sixty-fourth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ADDITIONAL CAPITOL POLICE.

Mr. PARK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 30, for the employment of 50 additional policemen for the Capitol Building and Grounds and the Senate and House Office Buildings.

Mr. SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 30, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. SANFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. PARK. I move, Mr. Speaker, to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Not to-day. That can only be done on the first and third Mondays.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of committees.

ENLISTMENT OF CERTAIN FOREIGN SUBJECTS.

Mr. WEBB (when the Committee on the Judiciary was called). Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 2893, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2893) to amend section 10 of chapter 2 of the Criminal Code.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 10 of chapter 2 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909, be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 10. Whoever, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, enlists or enters himself, or hires or retains another person to enlist or enter himself, or to go beyond the limits or jurisdiction of the United States with intent to be enlisted or entered in the service of any foreign prince, State, colony, district, or people as a soldier or as a marine or seaman on board of any vessel of war, letter of marque, or privateer shall be fined not more than $1,000 and imprisoned not more than three years: Provided, That this section shall not apply to citizens or subjects of any country engaged in war with a country with which the United States is at war."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, most Members will remember that this is the same bill we had up Saturday under a request for unanimous consent. The bill simply gives the right to that group of countries known as the entente allies to send their recruiting officers to this country to enlist by voluntary action citizens or subjects of the allied countries. That is all the bill does, gentlemen.

At the end of the proviso I am going to ask the House to adopt an amendment, which was suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], to make it perfectly plain that these recruiting officers shall not recruit any American citizens.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield, I have prepared an amendment in place of the one which I suggested to the gentleman before, and, while it has more words in it than I would like and more repetition of words, it clearly provides that only citizens of foreign countries engaged in war with countries with which we are engaged in war may enlist or solicit the enlistment of citizens or subjects of foreign countries engaged in war with countries with which we are at war. Unless the gentleman from North Carolina objects to the length of it I would like to have the new language of the bill read this way:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to any citizen or subject of any country engaged in war with a country with which the United States is at war who enlists or enters himself in the service of any foreign country engaged in war with a country with which the United States is at war, or who hires or engages another person who is a citizen or subject of a foreign country engaged in war with a country with which the United States is at war, to enlist or enter himself to go beyond the limits or jurisdiction of the United States with intent to be enlisted or entered in the service of a foreign country engaged in war with a country with which the United States is at war.

Mr. WEBB. I like the amendment which I am going to propose better than I do that one, because the amendment I propose is much shorter and clearer, and I think the House can understand it better.

Mr. MANN. The objection was raised the other day that the bill did not confine enlistments to the foreign nationals of those countries engaged in war with Germany. That was practically it. This removes the two limitations that now exist in the law. One is forbidding a person to enlist for military service under a foreign country, and the other is to forbid a foreigner soliciting enlistment for any purpose in this country. The language I have suggested would permit any citizen or subject of any of the countries now at war with Germany to enlist. That is the first proposition. The second is that it would permit a citizen or subject of any of those countries to solicit here or hire here any person who is a citizen of one of those countries to enter the service of one of those countries. The amendment I have now suggested would not permit an Italian, for instance, to solicit a Mexican to go to war. That is a mere illustration.

Mr. WEBB. The amendment which I will present would prevent that also. There is nothing in this bill that permits a Mexican to recruit a Jap, or vice versa, because the solicitation must be among the citizens or subjects of one of the allied countries, and only those.

Mr. MANN. I think not.

Mr. WEBB. I think it is perfectly clear that that is the meaning of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman's amendment would permit a recruiting officer to come here and solicit the enlistment of anybody who was not a citizen of the United States.

Mr. WEBB. I do not think so.

Mr. MANN. I know it does. I drew that amendment——

Mr. WEBB. I think the bill confines recruiting to citizens or subjects of the allied countries absolutely.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I want to ask the chairman of the committee what he thinks would become of the foreign-born seamen who have been registered under our new seaman's law if we pass an act like this—seamen whom we have obtained with great difficulty?

Mr. WEBB. I imagine they will remain seamen just like they are now, unless they want to go and fight for their own countries.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I imagine they will be enlisted with their own countrymen.

Mr. WEBB. I have no objection to that, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What will we do for seamen to man the ships we are building?

Mr. WEBB. There ought to be no objection to their going and fighting for their own countries.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Would the gentleman have them enlisted in a language we do not understand, under methods of which we do not approve in this country?

Mr. WEBB. We do approve of them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, we do not.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LITTLE. Your bill excepts from its provisions citizens of England and France?

Mr. WEBB. Of all allied countries.

Mr. LITTLE. They would not be punished for evading this law?

Mr. WEBB. There is no evasion. We authorize them to enlist their own citizens.

Mr. LITTLE. If Carranza or any Mexican leader should employ a Frenchman to enlist Englishmen to fight in Mexico, and he should start for El Paso with them, there is nothing under your bill to prevent it. Carranza or any Mexican leader can employ a Russian, an Englishman, or a Frenchman to raise as many men as he wants—citizens of other countries—to go down there and filibuster, and if it was Villa, for instance, he might raid this country with them. I am inclined to vote for the gentleman's bill. I think it is a meritorious bill, but there is a flaw there that I think the gentleman ought to correct. We ought to make a provision that none of the men excepted from this bill could recruit men for any war except the war that their country is engaged in. Why can not the gentleman do that?

Mr. WEBB. I think that would be covered by the present filibustering law. And, further than that, I think it improbable that an Englishman would come here to enlist Frenchmen to go down to fight in Mexico, or a Frenchman would enlist Englishmen to go down and fight in Mexico.

Mr. LITTLE. The filibustering law will not cover it, because you have expressly excepted from punishment those who engage in just that sort of thing.

Mr. WEBB. I do not think it would happen.

Mr. LITTLE. Of course it could happen.

Mr. WEBB. I think it would be hard to recruit a Frenchman to go and fight in Mexico when his own country is at war. Most Frenchmen have already gone to fight in France.

Mr. LITTLE. The world is full of soldiers of fortune, who will fight for anybody for money, and there is plenty of money in Mexico to employ them.

The gentleman says it could not happen.

Mr. WEBB. If that is so, they could go there to-day; there is nothing to keep them from going to Mexico.

Mr. LITTLE. But you have a law against recruiting here.

Mr. WEBB. Recruiting them; yes; but not to keep them from going if they want to.

Mr. LITTLE. There are not only thousands of soldiers in this country, but plenty of men that would be glad to have a job recruiting troops. The gentleman says it could not happen; and what is the use of having a law for that which may not happen? Murder may not happen, but still you have a law against it.

Mr. WEBB. The man who undertakes that sort of a game in this country will not get very far with it.

Mr. LITTLE. He will get as far as Mexico.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would like to ask the gentleman if he or his committee have heretofore considered the objections made by the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. LITTLE. I ask it because when the matter was submitted on Saturday I thought those objections were not valid, but on a more thorough consideration I think the bill ought to be amended in accordance with those suggestions.

Mr. WEBB. The suggestions are so extremely improbable and practically impossible that it is not worth while to put such provisions in the bill.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. Has the gentleman considered the question of a provision in the bill that such enlistments shall be under conditions prescribed by the War Department?

Mr. WEBB. No.

Mr. McCORMICK. Would it not be worth considering to take care of many of these objections?

Mr. WEBB. For the present we think the allied officials ought to use their own enlistment methods among their own citizens. It might become good policy later on for us to do as other countries have done and arrest, if necessary, all of the allies' subjects in this country subject to military age and turn them over to their respective countries. That is what was done in Europe, but we are not asking that now.

Mr. McCORMICK. It is evident that the House wishes to permit the allied Governments to solicit the enlistment of these nationals. There are many Members of the House who wish to protect foreign nationals in this country from misrepresentation or undue pressure and protect this country from the enlistment of such nationals for service in Mexico, as has been suggested. We can come to an agreement, perhaps without a division, which will safeguard the enlistment of European nationals in this country without any let or hindrance.

Mr. WEBB. I will say this to my friend: That any foreigner of the allied countries living in the United States who does not think enough of his own country to go back and fight for it ought at least to allow the officers of his country to come and appeal to him. It may be necessary later to send him back to his country.

Mr. McCORMICK. I do not say that the appeal ought not to be made, but there are settlements of foreigners in this country where an appeal might amount to duress; and unless we are willing to say explicitly that we are willing to permit the conscription of nationals of a foreign power we ought to provide for their protection from misrepresentation or duress.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I would like to ask the gentleman a question which seems to me affects a great many of us. There are tens of thousands of Americans serving with the Canadian Army in France. There are hundreds of Americans serving under France or Great Britain as aviators. Under this statute every one of them seems to be subject to imprisonment for having enlisted in a foreign country. If we are going to amend the statute at all, we ought to take care of these men. Does not the gentleman propose to make some amendment which would except them from the statute?

Mr. WEBB. There is nothing to prohibit a man from going into Canada and enlisting as far as I know. He has a right to go voluntarily. There is nothing in section 10 which makes it a crime for a native of this country to go up there and enlist.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The gentleman means that he can go of his own motion if no one asks him.

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. The President sent a communication to the American people a few days ago calling attention to the importance of everybody doing everything that they can in the producing line, and especially called attention to the fact that we should not neglect to promote the food supply. It seems to me that we ought to take into account the importance of keeping these men in this country to help raise the food that we need to eat during the war we are engaged in and ought not to permit any foreign Government to come here and take people out of this country when we need them here to do the work in civil life. It is more important that we should raise the food the American people need during this war and that they should aid in the manufactures we need by the men who are in this country regardless of whether they are American citizens or not. We should not allow foreign nations now at war to come here and enlist their nationals, and for one I am opposed to anything that will embarrass the situation that is confronting us, which demands the employment of every man now here to do the things that are necessary to be done to feed the American people during the war.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield to me to ask a question of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WEBB. I yield.

Mr. DYER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he does not think it is better to allow the foreign governments to come here and enlist their men to go and help fight than to have our fellows go there and fight?

Mr. MADDEN. I am assuming that our men will go and fight anyway. What I am opposed to is taking the men away from the civil activities of the United States where we need them to work.

Mr. DYER. Do not we have to take our men and send them?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; we do; and we will take our men and others, too; but we ought not to destroy the factories and the farms.

Mr. DYER. It is better to take the aliens than our own men.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, I want to say that I think very few of these foreigners who will probably enlist are working on the farms. If they are not working on the farms, the United States Government would have no power to conscript them and make them work on the farms, because they would not be subject to our conscription laws, being foreigners. In the next place, the farming foreigner will not be the one caught by this bill, and in that connection I desire to read what the New York Evening World said on the 13th of this month about this very thing:

> The Broadway brigade of British slackers is in imminent danger of being asked to fight for their own country. A bill was introduced in Congress to-day by Chairman WEBB permitting European allies to recruit their own subjects in this country. They can not be conscripted, the State Department says. Broadway theaters and clubs, uptown riding academies, and suburban golf links will be a fruitful field for these recruiting officers.

I do not think many of these fellows are working on the farms, and I do not think these enlistments will cover many farmers. It is better to let the allies come here and enlist their citizens and leave our American boys on the farms as long as possible, because we can not make them work under conscription laws.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. Perhaps there are thousands of foreigners here now who have made application for citizenship—filed their first papers. Does the gentleman not think that they should be exempted from being solicited to enter the European war, because of the fact that later on they may become citizens here, and if we pass a conscription act we may draft them into our own Army?

Mr. WEBB. No. The present laws or the rules of the Army permit foreign citizens who have taken out their first papers to enlist in our Army. If such a man is of military age, he can take his choice. He can enlist in our Army and become a fighter under the flag of this country or he can join his own forces in a foreign land.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I understand the gentleman to say that there is nothing in this bill that would permit a foreign Government to use duress in forcing their nationals to enlist. That is true, is it not?

Mr. WEBB. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CRAMTON. And, if it is true, what is there in the bill that will make it possible or will accomplish the enlistment of the English slackers to which the editorial the gentleman just read referred, who are now in the riding clubs and the theaters?

Mr. WEBB. I will say this: I do not think this enlisting law will get those slackers, but a little later we may pass a law that will put them in the army of their country, where they ought to be.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. JAMES. We have broken off diplomatic relations with Austria-Hungary, but we have not declared war upon that country. How will this affect the natives of Austria-Hungary?

Mr. WEBB. Living in this country?

Mr. JAMES. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. They would stay where they are. If they are not interned, they will stay where they are.

Mr. JAMES. Could they be enlisted under this?

Mr. WEBB. No.

Mr. JAMES. You merely speak of the countries who are at war?

Mr. WEBB. An Austro-Hungarian could not be enlisted under this, or a Bohemian.

Mr. JAMES. But he used only the word "war." This confines it to the allied countries and their nationals.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to this fact: It is important not only upon the farm, but upon the railway and in the mine that we should keep the labor that is willing to work in the mine and on the railroad and on the farm. Great quantities of laborers from the South, colored people, are coming North to work in the mines and on the railways because immigration from abroad has been cut off. The farmer boy will not tamp the ties, nor will the city boy. They will not work in the mines to get the coal that is to be mined. We are short on this labor.

It seems to me that we better let this matter alone and not pass this bill, for the reason that the English slacker of whom the Evening World speaks is not in the mines, nor is he tamping the ties. We have taken a great contract, and have appropriated $7,000,000,000 already, and we are to feed our allies. It seems to me that as to this labor which is absolutely necessary for the railway and the mines it would be better to keep them here than to send them somewhere else.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois I desire to say that he has made his entire argument upon the idea that we are authorizing these foreign countries to come here and conscript their citizens. There is nothing in this bill that permits the conscripting of a man working upon the railroad or anywhere else. So far it is confined absolutely to the man's voluntary act. If these foreigners can come here and persuade their citizens and subjects that their country needs them, and that it is their patriotic duty to go and fight for their country and enlist them under these circumstances, then I still maintain that they not only ought to be permitted to do so, but, so far as I am concerned, these men ought to be made to go before the boys of this country are required to go. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, let me see if I understand. If this bill becomes a law, it will do no more than this: It will enable the foreign countries, our allies at this time, to come into this country and persuade their subjects to go to Europe and fight.

Why did not the gentleman authorize them to come here and take them? Does the gentleman believe persuasion will do any good now?

Mr. WEBB. It will not hurt anything.

Mr. BUTLER. We are not after that which does not hurt, but after that which is effective. Why does not the gentleman authorize these people to come and take the slow people? We will probably have to take the slow people.

Mr. WEBB. I will tell the gentleman the reason why. This bill was requested by the President and the Attorney General, who said it was a very important matter, and even last night——

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, I am persuaded to vote for it.

Mr. WEBB. Secretary Lansing sent me word that he hoped the House would pass it with the greatest dispatch and give the system an opportunity to be tried and——

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think it goes far enough.

Mr. WEBB. We will probably go further later.

Mr. TEMPLE, Mr. FAIRFIELD, and Mr. MILLER of Minnesota rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire whether the gentleman can give information to the House on the point I am about to mention. In providing that foreign countries which are at war with a country with which we are at war may come here and enlist their nationals, I should like to know whether those countries have a voluntary-enlistment law or a compulsory-service law? Does Italy raise armies by voluntary enlistment, does Russia, does France, or do they have compulsory service? Now, is it our purpose to allow the agents of these Governments to come into our country and operate under the laws of their own countries? I do not know, but it is my impression that at least some of these countries have no volunteer system. Is it our purpose to have them come in here and operate under the laws that are in force now in their own countries? If so, there is probable trouble ahead of us.

To illustrate: In western Pennsylvania there are a great many thousands of foreigners. In the district I represent there were, according to the census of 1910, about 90,000 men over 21. Of those men over 21, 38,000 were foreign born. A great many of them are not citizens of the United States; some have taken out their first papers. Our mines and our steel mills are partly dependent upon those men. A great many of them have been called within the past two years by the consuls of the government of which they are subjects, and ordered as reservists to go and serve in the army of their country. Thousands responded, but many refused to go. Now, if under any system that we may adopt at the present time these governments were allowed to send recruiting agents here, what guaranty have we that there will be no representation that these reservists are required by the authorities of the United States to respond to the call? Also, in the case of men who once refused to respond to the call that came through the consulates and are now induced to go, what guaranty have they that they will not be punished for not responding to the previous call?

Mr. WEBB. One answer to the gentleman is, they want men too badly to be shooting them. They want to put them at the front, and if anybody shoots them let the enemy shoot them in warfare.

Mr. TEMPLE. There is also the somewhat troublesome question of double citizenship. Some countries have no naturalization treaties with the United States and when their subjects are naturalized in this country, under our laws they are American citizens, but under the law of their own country they are still citizens or subjects of that country. Now, when we authorize an agent to come over here and enlist those subjects, why not at least put language into the bill forbidding them to accept any that are our citizens under our law. I think the principle underlying the bill is a valuable one. It is certainly wise for us to make its intent as plain as we can.

Mr. WEBB. How can they be both citizens of the United States and subjects of a foreign country?

Mr. TEMPLE. Certainly.

Mr. WEBB. A man can not be.

Mr. TEMPLE. The State Department published more than a year ago a very plain discussion of that subject of dual citizenship, taking the ground that dual citizenship does exist. I ask the gentleman if he is not acquainted with that publication?

Mr. WEBB. There is nothing in this bill permitting a foreign agent to come over here and persuade and enlist a citizen who has become naturalized in the United States, and there would be no dual citizenship which would interfere with the workings of this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. What about those who have taken out their first papers?

Mr. WEBB. They can voluntarily go——

Mr. STAFFORD. No; the foreign governments will have the right of conscription under this bill.

Mr. WEBB. Excuse me. There is nothing of conscription in this bill. That is where the gentlemen are all wrong. There is no authority, not a syllable under it, which permits conscription.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman's bill authorizes a foreign government to come into the territory of the United States and exercise their jurisdiction here in order to secure enlistments, and they can make misrepresentations of all sorts in order to induce them to go abroad. Before the gentleman concludes I hope that he will give me some time in opposition to this bill.

Mr. WEBB. I will say in a word——

Mr. FAIRFIELD and Mr. SABATH rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. To no one at present.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I must decline to yield to anybody at present. Mr. Speaker, how much time has been used of my time?

The SPEAKER. Thirty minutes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; I will yield to my friend.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not true that some of the nations who are at war with Germany claim that the subjects of that country who have been naturalized here and are citizens of the United States are still subjects of that country?

Mr. WEBB. I think they claim it, but that does not make it so.

Mr. DOWELL. If that is claimed by these nations, does not this provision say to them that if he is a subject of that nation he may be taken under this law?

Mr. WEBB. If he is a citizen of this country, that sets aside any claim they might make. We apply the law of the United States.

Mr. DOWELL. Would the gentleman agree to an amendment that would protect citizens of the United States who have been naturalized?

Mr. WEBB. I can not understand why my friends here are so anxious to protect these foreigners who are in this country from going abroad to fight, but are willing to send American boys from the colleges and from the farms in the United States across the ocean to fight? [Applause.] We have a big job. I want to get all the foreigners we can get to go and fight. They may take the place of our own boys.

Mr. DOWELL. I will say to my friend that I favor permitting those countries to secure their own subjects, but I am not in favor of the other nations coming and getting citizens of the United States.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I think perhaps all of us are scarcely conscious of the trouble that might ensue unless the bill is very much safeguarded. I do not——

Mr. WEBB. I hope my friend will ask the question. He can have time to make a speech a little later.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman intend to have any discussion on this bill?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. The gentleman agreed a little while ago that it was not significant so far as the farmers are concerned, and yet the beet industry in this country depends almost wholly on foreign labor. And as has been suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] the railroads and the factories, it seems to me——

Mr. WEBB. I regret that I can not yield to my friend for a speech.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield for a speech.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry? The gentleman has an hour.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Do you think it is fair——

Mr. WEBB. I will have to decline to yield to the gentleman for a speech.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I want to ask a question.

Mr. WEBB. I yield to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if he intends to move the previous question at the expiration of an hour?

Mr. WEBB. No. This comes up on Calendar Wednesday, and each side has an hour of general debate, and then we will take it up for amendment under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MANN. There can be no five-minute rule except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WEBB. I intend to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This bill ought to be discussed, and I would like to have some time. It is not the purpose of the gentleman to move the previous question at the end of the hour?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. It is not my purpose to obstruct——

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the gentleman whether there is any possible reason why he should not accept an amendment such as proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, providing this enlistment should be made under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War, reserving from enlistment those he may deem necessary for production in this country, and giving him full and complete authority over the subject?

Mr. WEBB. I am perfectly willing to leave it to the Secretary of War to make rules, but I am not willing to leave it to him to make exempted classes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it the understanding of the gentleman from North Carolina that the Governments of the allied nations have not been recruiting in the past two years?

Mr. WEBB. I think every Frenchman of military age in the United States has gone to France to fight.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it the understanding that 220,000 have returned since 1914?

Mr. WEBB. I understand that there are 220,000 who have not returned to their native country, Italy.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it the gentleman's intention to get these aliens who have not yet responded? Is it the purpose of the gentlemen of the committee to introduce a bill compelling them to respond?

Mr. WEBB. I said that I was in favor of allowing it rather than sending our own boys. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is there anything to prevent these alien subjects from being conscripted in the American Army?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What?

Mr. WEBB. They have not taken out their papers. They are not American citizens.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Because the gentleman is not aware of the fact that these men, if they return now, after completing their military service, are liable to punishment, although they have already lost their property.

Mr. WEBB. They are not liable to any punishment under this bill. If such a man wants to go and fight for Italy, he can do it. If he does not want to volunteer under this bill, he can stay where he is, unless we later turn him over to his Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to say that the Italian subjects are willing to fight without conscription so that when this war is over they may return here. On the other hand, if they return to Italy now and serve in the Italian Army they are liable to punishment for having formerly avoided military service.

Mr. WEBB. We may turn them over to Italy if they do not return voluntarily, but that has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Has the gentleman pointed out how it is possible to enlist a man under those circumstances?

Mr. WEBB. No; I am leaving that to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. An English conscripting officer can come here with a handful of shillings and——

Mr. WEBB. Yes; with all the money he pleases.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Oregon?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. SINNOTT. Does the gentleman understand from the bill that it permits only voluntary enlistments?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; that is the case.

Mr. SINNOTT. I want to call attention to this fact, that the verb "enlist" in this bill is both a transitive and an intransitive verb. Under the transitive interpretation of this word, this bill would permit the forcible taking of a subject of a foreign country.

Mr. WEBB. No; it would not.

Mr. SINNOTT. A man may enlist himself or he may enlist another person.

Mr. WEBB. But he must do that by peaceful and voluntary means.

Mr. SINNOTT. No; he can forcibly enlist another man.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman will find by reference to the dictionary that the word "enlist" can only be voluntary in the sense in which it is used in this bill. I can enlist somebody, but such an enlistment must be voluntary on the part of the other person.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Oregon is correct about the verb; but the language of the law, in the intransitive sense, is "or hires or retains another person to enlist." So that it does not permit a forcible enlistment.

Mr. SINNOTT. Would it not permit an officer to enlist? For instance, if I was to enlist you I would enroll you.

Mr. MANN. This is to enlist when he enters himself.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. I do not think this bill was very carefully drawn.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am for the present; yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. If any gentleman who is squarely against it wants to speak, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. How much?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. An hour, if I have time.

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman simply yield to me for recognition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the existing penal code forbids anyone within the United States to enlist for foreign military service. It also forbids anyone in the United States from soliciting, the language being "to hire or retain any other person to enlist for foreign military service." That is the law as it stands. I do not know to what extent the law has been violated. I think there have been some prosecutions.

Now, it is proposed by the amendment drafted by the Department of Justice to provide that this section of the penal code shall not apply either to individuals enlisting or as to recruiting officers soliciting other people to enlist when such persons are citizens or subjects of any of the other countries at war with Germany. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], in charge of the bill, has announced that he would offer an amendment adding to the limitation of authority in the bill that it should not authorize the enlistment of citizens of the United States.

Under that amendment and the provision of the bill, first, an Englishman here would be permitted to enlist without being subject to the penalty of the law; and, second, the English Government might have here an English recruiting officer who would have the right under the amended law to solicit the enlistment of anyone except an American citizen.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood my colleague to say that the gentleman from North Carolina had prepared and was going to submit an amendment providing that American citizens could not be enlisted under this bill?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Ought it not also to include a provision as to persons who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States? It seems to me that when a person has declared his intention of becoming a citizen of the United States, he has then declared in favor of the American flag and ought to be recognized.

Mr. MANN. Well, I doubt whether I fully agree with my colleague in reference to that. But this enlistment in either case is voluntary.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, may I ask my friend a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I want to make a little statement first. I am not going to take much time. I promised to yield time. The enlistment is thoroughly voluntary. So far as the law is concerned, it is voluntary. No one is obliged to enlist under this law. Of course, a man who enlists and goes to Italy, and Italy claims that he is a citizen of Italy, while we claim that he is a citizen of the United States, he would be beyond the jurisdiction of the United States after he went abroad and might be punished there. Well, he does not need to enlist. If he does not enlist, and we pass the law that the President is asking for, he will be subject to conscription in the United States to go into the American Army.

Now, I have suggested an amendment. The gentleman from North Carolina very graciously stated that the amendment which he proposes to offer was drafted by me. That was for the purpose of preventing the foreign recruiting officers endeavoring to enlist citizens of the United States, because as the bill originally came to us the foreign recruiting officer would not be subject to any penalty for enlisting a citizen of the United States, though the citizen of the United States would be subject to the penalty, which would not be worth much if he got beyond the confines of the United States.

I drafted an amendment—hurriedly, and I have no pride in it—proposing to provide specifically that the foreign recruiting agent who comes here, say from England, shall have authority to recruit only Englishmen, Frenchmen, Russians, Italians, or citizens or subjects of other countries engaged in war with Germany; that he shall not have permission to recruit anybody except the nationals of those countries engaged in war with Germany. While the language is a little verbose, because it requires the repetition of the same words in three different places, it covers the Mexican situation suggested by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE]; and I have added to this amendment the provision suggested by my colleague from Chicago [Mr. MCCORMICK,] so as to provide for these enlistments under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BURNETT. If I understand it, the citizenship that is referred to is that of a foreigner who has acquired his final papers. Those having taken out only first papers could be enlisted, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BURNETT. Is it not true that in many States—Indiana, Texas, and others—a man who has taken out his first papers is, in the most essential qualifications, such as that of being a qualified elector, a citizen of the State? And would such a man be subject to enlistment under this bill?

Mr. MANN. Remember, it is voluntary.

Mr. BURNETT. Of course.

Mr. MANN. When this bill was first shown to me I gagged at it. But, after all, as a matter of broad policy we are engaged in war. We are going to do a good many things that we would not do in time of peace. We are going to raise an army of American citizens. That is inevitable. How that army will be raised is yet a question. What will be done with it is yet a question; but I would prefer to provide by law permission for foreigners who came from countries now at war with Germany to go back to Europe and fight there the battles in which their former countries are specially interested, in preference to sending first our own boys over there. [Applause.] This merely gives an opportunity for such men to enlist without being subject to the penalty of the law. If they enlist now, or if one of them is now solicited to go abroad to fight in the Italian Army or the Russian Army, the man so enlisting is subject to a severe penalty, and the man soliciting his services is also subject to a severe penalty. That law may have been violated. Probably it has. I think we may justly remove the penalty and permit these men, if they want to do so, to go abroad and fight.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HULBERT. I understand the gentleman to say that citizens of other countries living here who do not volunteer could be conscripted into the American Army under the President's plan.

Mr. MANN. I understand so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman yields back his time will he answer this question: An alien comes to this country and does not take out naturalization papers. After he comes to this country a son is born to him, who reaches the age of 21 years. If this act gave authority to conscript, would not that 21-year-old son, born in this country, be liable to conscription and be forced to go back to a country which he had never seen?

Mr. MANN. We do not authorize any conscription in this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know; but assuming that it did authorize conscription, what would be the status of that American-born child?

Mr. MANN. A man born in the United States is a citizen of the United States, no matter what may be the nationality of his parents.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the Italian Government recognize that, and does it not insist that that 21-year-old son, born in the United States, is still subject to its jurisdiction and its sovereignty, and would it not insist that that 21-year-old American-born boy should go back to Italy?

Mr. MANN. I do not think so, but I do not know.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think that is the Italian law. I have asked the gentleman this question because the matter has been brought to my attention.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Can anything be done for those American-born boys who go to Europe and are there shot to pieces and are then sent back to the United States, and who are now detained at Ellis Island without any clothes or other comforts?

Mr. MANN. I do not know.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. There are cases of that kind.

Mr. MANN. I am not on the Immigration Committee, and I will leave that to gentlemen who are.

Mr. SIEGEL and Mr. FESS rose.

Mr. MANN. I do not want to answer too many questions. I will yield time to gentlemen if they desire it.

Mr. SABATH. Who has control of the time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has it on one side and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] on the other.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] all of my hour except 10 minutes, so that the gentleman from Illinois may control 50 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania yields to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] the remainder of his hour except 10 minutes, which he reserves for himself.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker this bill is a dangerous bill, and it ought to have the very careful consideration of the Representatives of the people. I have sworn in under the President, and I want to go along with the President on all his war measures, but I want to draw the line somewhere between civilization and barbarity, and I would like still to have left some reasoning power as a Member of this House. I do not wish to be carried off my feet because the galleries applaud, nor do I care to be swept from my position as an American Representative because it happens that many of the representatives of our allies are here urging certain things.

For generations we have encouraged foreign-born people to come to the United States, giving them the assurance that this was a haven from political and religious persecution. Men and women have come in good faith to avoid the persecution they suffered at the hands of foreign potentates, some of whom are our allies at the present time. Now, the proposition is that we shall open up our country to the military officers of foreign Governments, who shall station themselves here in our midst to recruit from among those who have come here to avoid persecution—Jews, Italians, Roumanians, Russians, British, including the Irish, and all others, except at the present time the Germans, who prior to this war were regarded as a very high class of immigrants.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman state how the passage of this amendment would change the political or legal status of any citizen or subject of a foreign country now in this country?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I think the passage of this bill would have a very serious effect upon a large body of Jews who have come here to avoid Russian persecution and who, if shoulder straps appeared in their midst to persuade them to go back to Russia, would play havoc with a very large portion of our citizenship. If the gentleman wants to see the military officers of Russia enter the Jewish quarters of the United States and persuade these men and women, who are familiar with Russian outrages and who came here to avoid persecution, to go back he will understand the meaning of my statement that it does seriously affect the citizenship of the United States.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman realizes and understands that the conditions in Russia are different to-day than they have been heretofore, and that there are thousands of people who are willing to support Russian democracy. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know that the morning papers announce that the present ambassador from Russia will decline to serve the present Government, because he believes in an autocratic government. I know that it is reported from the other side that overtures are being made by Germany to certain authorities in Russia to go back to the autocratic system. I do not know how permanent the revolution in Russia may be.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Briefly.

Mr. COX. Why have not these people taken out letters of naturalization?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman wants me to be frank——

Mr. COX. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman that I believe the alien who is most lax in taking out naturalization papers in the United States is not the Irishman, is not the German, is not the Italian, but the Britisher.

Mr. COX. That is the very reason we ought to send them back to their own country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may be; but I do not care to have the British shoulder straps marching in parade about the United States, inducing men to go over and fight with the British Army. I want to save these people for the Army of the United States and for the business that we have to do.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Does not the gentleman think it is better for these men to be sent over there than it is for our boys to go?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do; but our boys are not going over there until they are in a condition to go, and when they go they are going as an American Army to fight as Americans. I hold that this is an American war. [Applause.] The trouble with the gentleman and some others is that he wants to be influenced by the powers abroad more than he wants to maintain the independence or sovereignty of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was interested in the gentleman's anxiety that some Russian who is now in the United States might be persecuted by the Russian Government. I want to inquire if there is anything in this amendment which would permit any Russian officer or officer of a foreign government to compel anybody in the United States to join a foreign army?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is as generous in his question as I might be if I said that I heard a gentleman on his side the other day say that he would pledge 100,000 negroes from his own State to be in the first line of battle when the shooting began. It is a beautiful thing to send your wife's relatives to the front. A great many people are now parading about with American flags and boasting of their patriotism who are ready and willing to "let George do the fighting."

Mr. BARKLEY. But the gentleman has not answered my question. I asked the gentleman to point out specifically anything that compelled anybody to fight with a foreign army. The gentleman's reference to 100,000 negroes does not answer my question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If we pass a law permitting pickets to picket a mill, would anybody go to work while the pickets are guarding it? Does the gentleman think that sending officers of the Imperial Army of Italy into the midst of Italian colonies in New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago is going to induce people to come to them as flies would go to a molasses barrel? The gentleman does not care to answer a question of that kind.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have been as liberal in answering the gentleman's question as he was in answering mine.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Is the gentleman opposed to letting these nationalities enlist in this country to go fight in their own country?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not at all, if they want to go.

Mr. HARDY. Is not that all that this bill does?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The foreign consuls in the United States have solicited, so far as they had the power to do, all aliens to go back and fight for their countries, and many have gone back, as they ought to have done. I am perfectly willing that those who want to go back shall go, but I question whether we ought to set up a military establishment for foreign governments in this country to enlist aliens now working in our mines and otherwise serving a useful and necessary purpose here. I question whether we should permit the Russian Government, for instance, to maintain military officers here to induce Roumanians or Russian Jews who came here through fear of Russian oppression to go back. We can use these people here.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I may be ready for conscription sooner than the gentleman from Kentucky is.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, no; the gentleman is not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am ready to take these aliens into the service of the United States. For the present we need them here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi). The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope the House will not vote upon this bill until after full discussion and after full consideration. The bill needs amendment. It is imperfect. There is, I think, more behind it than we can see, or than is told to us. In my opinion, the fact that an effort was made to pass this bill late Saturday afternoon, after the passage of the great war bond issue, when so many of the Members were leaving, thinking that the day's work was done, and the fact that the printed report upon this bill was not available until yesterday, and the further fact that the report itself, not put in until after Saturday's action, is enough to make thinking Members know there is something concealed behind this measure.

I have heard that behind this is a scheme to gather up a lot of the very poorest Italians, Finnish people, Poles, and others and start them across the water with a great hullabaloo that America is sending troops into the trenches of France. Is that what is in it? Is not that a sort of mock patriotism and an evasion of America's real duty? Does anyone think that an imitation army of that kind will serve the purpose? A poor deluded gathering of "wops" and "bohunks."

Intelligent aliens will not be caught by this measure but will enlist with our armies. This bill, I think, should not have been pressed until after we have passed our own Army bill—volunteer or selective, whichever you please. Then, after these aliens have had a full free chance with us, if they fail, some scheme like this drafting or soliciting by foreign officers might be tried.

In the last six or seven years over 6,000,000 people have come to these United States. To become fully naturalized requires five years. Many have not had that full chance. In my part of the country are many Finnish people and Poles and Slavonians, and I believe that inasmuch as they came to the United States expecting to enjoy the very liberties that we are now going into battle for, that if they are going to fight, they should be permited to fight with us, as they have done and will do. Read the list of the men killed at Vera Cruz. All of them, with two or three exceptions, had foreign names. They were "first-paper" citizens, fighting with us. In 1812, when we had our difficulty with Great Britain, we made citizens immediately of British subjects who would fight with us. There is no need for such haste with this bill. The more you look at it the worse it seems, in my opinion. Let it be amended.

And, Mr. Speaker, I would like to see another bill pressed. I have received a letter from a German citizen who was within two months of his final papers, and owing to a delay in completing those papers, because he had been admitted as a seaman to follow his vocation instead of as an immigrant, he is now known as an alien enemy of the United States.

I think that, instead of passing a bill of the kind under consideration, which will breed trouble and discord in the United States, I assure you, it would be far better to introduce and pass a bill to let these patriotic Germans who will do so renew their oath of allegiance so that they may be known, not as alien enemies but as citizens of the United States, and let them fight with us, alongside of us, together with the very aliens this present measure endeavors to be impressed for our allies.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. Before he begins, I desire to know how much time I have remaining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Twenty-seven minutes, taking out the time of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended for 30 minutes.

Mr. WEBB. How much time has the gentleman used already? Does the gentleman think that he will need an hour more?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has 32 minutes remaining now, and the gentleman from North Carolina 20 minutes.

Mr. WEBB. That would make almost an hour. I will supplement that request by asking that the advocates of the bill be permitted to have 30 minutes additional, if they think it necessary at the end of that time.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that the gentleman from Illinois is controlling the time of those who are opposed to the bill. For instance, he is going to give me some time, and I am heartily in favor of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I am controlling the time on this side of the House.

Mr. WEBB. I have no objection to the additional time; but we have some other bills here, and I hope the gentleman will help me to facilitate their passage.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from North Carolina and the time controlled by myself be extended each 30 minutes over the hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time be extended for 1 hour, 30 minutes of that time to be controlled by himself and 30 minutes by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, if this law, section 10 of chapter 2 of the Criminal Code, has been upon our statute books for the past two years, then I desire to say that it has been violated every day since 1914 by the representatives of foreign governments. We are now seeking to legalize these violations. When this bill came up on Saturday I was about to leave. I was surprised that an attempt should be made to force through the House in that manner such an important measure. Immediately after adjournment I took a train and went to New York to ascertain whether it was true, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] stated, that there were hundreds and thousands of alien subjects liable to military duty still here and that practically none had returned to their native countries to fight. I found that since 1914, 75,000 Italians have returned to Italy, and out of the 75,000 I venture the statement that at least 60 per cent returned under a misapprehension of the law.

The Italian consulates throughout the country advertised the summons and call to arms in the various Italian papers published in this country. We permitted them to do that. They went back. Well and good. The Italian law specifically provides that any subject who does not present himself at the time of the call shall lose whatever property he owns in the Kingdom, and provides further a heavy penalty of imprisonment if he returns after the completion of his military service at any time later than the day he is ordered to report.

Every Frenchman subject to call, I understand and have been reliably informed, has already returned and reported for duty. I can not understand the purpose of this bill. It is certainly not to apply to the subjects of the Italian Government or French Government, who have already returned. There is something else in it. We have been for the past two years advocating and encouraging allegiance to the American flag. We have said repeatedly that the residents of this country, regardless of citizenship, who have received the hospitality of a free country, who have had an opportunity to earn a livelihood here, owe undivided allegiance to the American flag, and yet here we are now encouraging a dual allegiance. We have heard on the floor of this House to-day talk about the duty they owed to their mother country. How inconsistent an attitude we now assume toward these aliens. They came here with the understanding they would be protected and here we are enacting a law which will be the handmaid of shanghaing these men back. I do not know how the gentleman from North Carolina could prevent the recruiting officers in a mining district or out in the farming districts from inducing these men through false pretenses to go aboard ship and shanghai them home. That is what is going to be done. I do not know whether the gentleman from North Carolina has considered the fact that we need these men here. We need them in the factories, we need them in the fields; they are working, and they are not on the golf links or in the riding clubs, as suggested by him, but they are working and producing all that which we need.

Before the Sixty-fifth Congress is over there will be a cry in this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific to repeal that very obnoxious, unwise immigration law which was passed the last session. There will be a cry for men to work in the mines and elsewhere, and we will be compelled to lower the head tax on immigrants in order to get much-needed labor. Now, you are attempting to deplete these factories. You are taking these men away and forcing them back home. You call it a volunteer system. How can it be a volunteer system when these men are compelled to serve? Can you say to a man convicted of a crime that he can volunteer to serve his time? It is just as logical. I can vouch for the Italian residents of this country. They are eager, willing, and anxious to fight for this country, but they want to fight under the American flag. [Applause.] Do you know that the first soldier in the service of the American Government in this war who gave his life for his adopted country was an Italian. I refer to John E. Epolucci, a sailor of the arm squad on the steamer Aztec, who lost his life on April 2. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will.

Mr. WEBB. If these Italians are so anxious to fight under the American flag and have been here for years and years, why do they not become naturalized citizens when they could fight under the flag, and then they would not be liable to be solicited to go abroad?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They do; and the answer to the question is on account of their limitations; because we have put such a severe test upon citizenship that those men who have been working in the mines and in the factories and elsewhere have been working day and half the night and have not had the opportunity to learn English and to fit themselves for citizenship.

Mr. WEBB. Under this bill they do not have to go back unless they want to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then, why the bill?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. President—Mr. Speaker, I hope I addressed the Chair not entirely without inspiration—if a young man who had a journey to make after nightfall should let his mind be continuously and completely filled with ghosts and hobgoblins and graveyards and murders, he probably would not get very far. Gentlemen who are opposed to this amendment, it seems to me, are paralyzing their capacity to act correctly by giving their thoughts entirely to ghosts and to hobgoblins. It seems to me that they are raising a bunch of ghosts that they may be scared of the law. It does not seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that this proposed amendment can possibly contain any of the bad things they speak of if this becomes a law. If I can understand the English language aright, it means that representatives of a foreign government can come to the United States and receive the enlistment, perhaps solicit the enlistment, of citizens of the country from which those representatives come. It only goes that far. It does not change the legal or the political status of a single alien in the United States.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes; for a brief question.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Why can not you then allow these men to volunteer if they want to go back to those countries? Why do you want to bring recruiting officers over here after them?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. They can volunteer, and this but permits things to be done in an orderly manner. I simply say that this bill goes no further than permitting those representatives to come and in a legitimate way arrange for receiving the enlistment of volunteers who are their own nationals. Whether they will come or not I do not know, but I am not scared of their coming.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Why should they want to come here?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If there are men in this country of military age, citizens of a foreign country, and their country, our ally, wants them to fight for their native land, why, let us give those nations a chance to appeal to their citizens and let us give those citizens a chance to enlist. Gentlemen are inclined to talk about the aliens that are in their districts and who are necessary for the conduct of the industries there. I do not believe any of them are more seriously situated than I am myself. The district from which I come mines 62 per cent of all the iron ore mined in the United States every year. That region is filled with representatives from those countries affected. I am not afraid of the application of this law at all. There has been from that region a migration to Europe ever since August, 1914, of men who have gone back to fight for their own country. There has been a continuous stream of them; in fact, about all have gone who will go and who want to go. Those who remained, in general, do not want to go and will not go. You can change this law a thousand times and you would not alter their determination, as far as the bulk of them are concerned.

They want to remain here, and if they do any fighting they will do it under the flag of this country. I am not afraid of the operation of the iron mines of Minnesota. I am not afraid of the operation of the munition factories of the United States. That is a ghost at which we do not need to be scared at all, nor need we be afraid of some representative of a foreign country coming to the United States and using duress to induce their fellow citizens to go back and fight. They can not practice duress under and amidst the free institutions of this Government.

Mr. LANGLEY. If it is true that all have gone that can go what will this amendment accomplish?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It is not absolutely correct, perhaps, to say that all have gone who will go, but the great majority of those in my region have gone who will go, and I believe that is very generally true elsewhere; but there is no reason on earth why we should not let those go from now on who will want to go. Nor is there any reason why we should prohibit any representative of a foreign country telling their nationals that their place is at home. The appeal properly made will doubtless stir patriotism and induce some to go home to fight.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What is to prevent the aliens from returning now?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Nothing whatever.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then why this amendment?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. This does not change their political or legal status a bit, as I have tried to emphasize a dozen times, but permits them to enlist here instead of going home to enlist and permits representatives of foreign countries to come here and in an orderly way accept the enlistments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. May I have one minute more, or is the time all gone?

Mr. MANN. It is all gone, but I will yield one minute to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. My friend from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has grown very earnest about the Italians who have not returned, citizens of Italy, and whose property has been forfeited. This will not change their condition in life at all. Their property has been forfeited, not because this law exists or will exist, not because we are going to enact this law, but because they themselves did not go back to their country in accordance with the laws of that country. And Italy has no additional power under this to coerce or injure them or confiscate their property or take any action respecting them whatsoever. If they never want to be subjected to punishment by the Italian Government, let them stay here in this country, where they properly may, as they are here of their own free choice, and they need have no fear while here. Let them become citizens of the United States. One good thing this bill will do, and that is to induce many aliens residing here to perfect their citizenship in this country.

Mr. FOCHT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question on his own admission. You admitted that we need all of these men here for industrial purposes?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I did not admit that and I do not admit it.

Mr. FOCHT. You did not say we need them here. You did admit that they could be recruited and put into the American Army.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will say this, that at a time like this, when the United States may be up against the most serious hour of her life, when she may have to strain every element of her strength to live, I would that every man in the United States was a citizen of the country. [Applause.] I would that every man in every factory owed allegiance to nobody but the Stars and Stripes. I would that every man in the mines were a citizen of the United States. There are people enough in the United States now who are idle and unemployed who can take the places of all these men who are apt to go, and I say for God's sake let them go if they prefer to remain citizens of their mother country rather than become citizens of our own.

Mr. FOCHT. You admit that they can go now unhampered and unhindered?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Absolutely.

Mr. FOCHT. We are right at the point now, and why is it necessary that we have this law now in order to have them go?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. This does not change that a bit—their ability to enlist in the mother country's service.

Mr. FOCHT. Why do you have to have that if they can already go?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. This does permit representatives from foreign countries to come and solicit them to go, and enables them to enlist here in America for service in Europe.

Mr. FOCHT. Why do you have to have the country overrun by foreign representatives? Why do they need this when they can go and have gone? Too many trees and too many woods, it seems to me, to answer that question.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If I have time I shall be pleased to answer the question as often as the gentleman asks it.

Mr. FOCHT. That is the question, and you have not answered it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, let us remain cool and unexcited and carefully consider what we are discussing here to-day.

House bill 2893 is intended to amend section 10 of chapter 2 of the Criminal Code. The amendment consists in the addition of the proviso "that this section shall not apply to citizens or subjects of any country engaged in war with a country with which the United States is at war."

The existing statute has been in force for many years, and has been interpreted as applying to foreign consuls seeking to raise troops here for the military service of Great Britain. (7 Opinions of Attorney Generals, 367; 4 id., 336.) It has also been decided that it does not apply to those who go abroad for foreign enlistment or to those who transport such persons (United States v. Kazinski, 2 Sprague, 7), I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

The evident intention of the existing law is to prohibit enlistment within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States for the purpose of going beyond its limits and jurisdiction for the purpose of entering into the service of a foreign government. The proviso declares that the section shall not apply to the citizens or subjects of any country engaged in war with a country with which the United States is at war. In view of the fact that the present law refers not only to the enlistment of a person within the jurisdiction of the United States, but also to the hiring or retaining of another person to enlist himself, it would appear that, with this proviso, it would be proper for a citizen or subject of a country engaged in war with a country with which the United States is at war—as, for instance, Great Britain, or France, or Italy—to come into the United States and there to enlist citizens of the United States for service abroad.

What the framers of this proviso apparently had in mind was that the section should not apply to the enlistment of citizens or subjects of any country engaged in a war with a country with which the United States is at war. In other words, that the citizens or subjects of Russia, Italy, France, or Great Britain who should happen to be in the United States might enlist within our territory in the armies of those respective countries for the purpose of carrying on war with the central powers. That is an entirely distinct proposition from that of enlisting citizens of the United States in the armies of another country.

Under the general practice one who thus enlists in a foreign army must necessarily take an oath of allegiance to the government of whose army he becomes a part, and that would mean an abjuration of American citizenship.

Citizens born here, boys of Italian parentage, born here in the United States who have gone to Italy for study or travel, have been forcibly seized and put into the Italian Army, the contention of the Italian Government being that, once a citizen of Italy, whether by parentage or otherwise, a man and his children and their children remain citizens of Italy.

Now, that is a settled proposition. Any Member of this House calling up the Citizenship Bureau of the State Department will be so informed. I have handled a number of cases with the State Department, and it was at my request that special dispatches were sent to Ambassador Page at Rome, Italy, for the purpose of obtaining the release of some boys who were sent there to study and who were forcibly seized in that manner.

The trouble with this bill is that you are going to permit Italian officers and Russian officers and Roumanian recruiting officers to come to New York City and other large cities of this country and go amongst their countrymen and those who have taken out their first papers——

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. I wanted to ask the gentleman if we had not denied that contention as to citizens of a foreign country living in this country?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes. Several Secretaries of State have said so. Secretary Blaine said so, and the present able Secretary has said so. He has sent special dispatches to our ambassador to that effect. But here is the situation: You do not say in this bill whether this is to be in accordance with our laws and in accordance with the regulations of our Army and Navy. You simply use the word "enlistment."

Mr. BORLAND. We determine that.

Mr. SIEGEL. Not under the terms of this bill. Let me say that all the Americans that went abroad and enlisted over there are no longer American citizens. That proposition was fully considered and determined by Judge Ray in the case In re Griffin, Two hundred and thirty-seventh Federal Reporter, page 445, where it was held that a citizen of the United States who enlists in the army of a foreign country for over-sea service, making the necessary declarations, expatriates himself, and when he subsequently comes to this country he subjects himself to all of the provisions with respect to deportation contained in the immigration laws of the United States.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I want to ask the gentleman whether the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] and agreed to by his colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN], giving the Secretary of War permission to prescribe certain rules under which this enlistment shall take place, will not obviate those difficulties?

Mr. SIEGEL. That would obviate them to a certain extent, provided that men who have taken out their first papers should not be considered as subjects or citizens of those countries abroad.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. MCCORMICK. The amendment reads in this way:

Provided further, That any enlistment or solicitation of enlistment under this section shall be under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. SIEGEL. That would answer, provided you use the words "voluntary enlistment of citizens of subjects of any country." You want to put in the word "voluntary" there. You want enlistments according to our statutes, and not in accordance with the statutes of the countries abroad. Some one in the Cabinet should have some supervision over these matters.

Now, the views of Judge Ray, in the case of In re Griffin, has been sustained in the Supreme Court in the case of MacKenzie against Hare, in Two hundred and thirty-ninth United States, page 299. Judge Ray held that such an oath of allegiance to a foreign government is effective, even if the consent of the United States is given.

At this time, when our country is at war, it would be most extraordinary if we should permit American citizens to abjure their allegiance, even though it be for the purpose of entering into the army of a nation which is also at war with the central powers. Would it not interfere with our own public policy, whether our Army is to be recruited from volunteers or by universal conscription? Potentially every American citizen may be called upon, should the emergency arise, to serve our country in its own armies, rather than a foreign country. It is therefore important that, for the purpose of preventing serious harm to our country, there should be added after the word "to" in line 1 of page 2, the words "the enlistment of." That would prevent the enlistment within the territory and jurisdiction of the United States of American citizens or subjects for service in a foreign army.

But even if the bill were thus amended, it would still be subject to an objection which may be a serious one. It would permit the officers of a foreign government to come to the United States and there enlist aliens residing here, upon whose industry our country may largely depend. Thus, for instance, it might permit the enlistment of men engaged in the construction of important public works—the New York subway, for example; or men engaged in agricultural pursuits, who, under existing conditions, would perform a service to our country fully as important as that of enlistment in our own Army, to say nothing of foreign armies. At this time there is a dearth of labor; immigration has been cut off. If these industrial factors can thus be taken from us, might we not sustain a grievous injury?

It is further to be noted that even if the proviso were amended as above suggested, it would still apply to aliens who have taken out their first papers and who intend to become citizens of the United States. By abjuring allegiance to the country from which they came they have indicated their purpose to become American citizens. Is it proper that they should under the circumstances be permitted to enlist in a foreign army? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SIEGEL. I ask leave, Mr. Speaker, to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that there ought to be just one test applied to all these war measures, and that test is, What policy will best aid the United States in winning this war in the shortest possible time? [Applause.]

I think upon all these questions we should endeavor to measure these bills by that test, and so measuring this bill I believe that there are many citizens and subjects of foreign governments who can best help the United States in this war for our country, and their own country as well, by going abroad to fight, and that as to those citizens every encouragement should be offered, such as is proposed in this bill. But, applying that test, there ought to be limitations as to any power that is granted in this bill. I think we will all agree that there are foreigners in the United States to-day who can best serve the United States in winning this war by remaining here; and there ought to be power lodged somewhere to prevent the operation of this bill as to that class of citizens. For instance, we need every man in the United States who knows anything about shipbuilding to stay here in the building of ships. We need every seaman that is to-day serving upon an American ship to remain upon that American ship; every skilled worker in every munition factory ought to stay where he is. And so I might go on at some length, but in these three cases that I have mentioned it is of no benefit to the United States to permit those classes of foreigners to be taken out and be sent abroad to fight, requiring a year of training in Italy or in France or elsewhere, as the case may be, when, if they remained here, engaged in this very necessary and important work and production, they might not only shorten this war but they might do that which so many of us hope may be the case in consequence of this production—so shorten the war that it will not be necessary for a single American boy to go to a single European battle field. [Applause.]

Now, it has been suggested that that power be lodged in the Secretary of War to prohibit these foreigners from being solicited where he determines that the public welfare requires that they stay here. Why should not that be done? Whatever the military bill may provide, whether it be a conscription bill or a voluntary enlistment bill, I take it for granted that there will be certain exempted classes, determined either by Congress or by the President, where we will not take those exempted classes, if it is a conscription, or that will not permit voluntary enlistment, wherever it is determined that the exempted classes can best serve the United States by remaining where they are; and if we are to apply that principle to our own citizens, why should we not apply it to those foreigners who are now within our borders?

If they can best serve the United States in winning this war by staying here, we ought not to permit anybody to solicit them to go abroad and fight.

Mr. REAVIS. If we apply that principle, and are to conscript for trench warfare in Europe the youth of America who can be spared from productive business, why not conscript these foreigners in the same way?

Mr. LENROOT. That may be; but if they are willing within within the next 30 or 60 days, through this recruiting, to get ready to fight and help us win this war over there, why not permit them to do it under this bill? Why wait for conscription?

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman believe we have the right to conscript foreigners in our country?

Mr. LENROOT. I could not discuss that at this time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, the men who are covered in this bill owe an allegiance to some government. Either they owe a duty to the government of which they are citizens, or they owe a duty to the Government of the United States. Under this bill we will give them an opportunity to say whether or not they prefer the government of which they are citizens to the Government of the United States. If they prefer to fight under the colors of their own country they will be given the opportunity to enlist. Officers from their armies in Europe will be here to explain how they can enlist, and to arrange for their transportation to the trenches of Europe. If they do not want to do that, then they can say, "We do not want to go. We prefer to stay in the United States." Then there may be a law passed here which will authorize the President to conscript those very men into the Army of the United States, and when that is done they can not say that they do not want to fight under the colors of the United States because they are citizens of Italy, or of Great Britain, or of some other country which is at war with Germany. They must do their duty somewhere. We are in this war. We are fighting with these allied countries. We may say we are not, but we are fighting the Imperial German Government to bring it to terms, and the people are all interested in this matter; and if they are here in this country enjoying its privileges and opportunities, and have not sought or obtained citizenship, they must owe a duty to their own country, and if they do not take advantage of the opportunity to go and fight for their country, then they must not be given the opportunity to deny that they will fight for the United States. That is the question that is before us.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. REED. I am in favor of most of the provisions of this bill, but I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I would also like the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman ask his question?

Mr. REED. Where is the inspiration for this legislation? Does it come from our State Department or our War Department, or has England, Germany, or France, or some other country, through its diplomatic agents, asked for the enactment of this law?

Mr. DYER. I will answer the gentleman's question. I am a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, and so far as I know this bill is reported favorably without opposition. Am I right about that?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. DYER. The committee has made a unanimous report. I will say to the House that our committee has been urged by the President of the United States to pass this bill.

Mr. REED. Has the President been asked by the representatives of foreign governments to obtain its passage? I merely wish to know if those governments have found their methods operating through their consuls inefficient and want our cooperation?

Mr. DYER. I do not know upon what information the request was made to the Judiciary Committee by the President of the United States. He made the request, and that was supplemented further by the request of the Secretary of State, and also by the request of the Attorney General of the United States, and upon the requests of those three men, and upon the justice of this measure I am ready here to take my stand and support it with my voice and my vote, believing it to be my duty to my own country, the country that we ought to be willing and anxious to serve in this hour, and my duty to the American flag. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, those who seek to amend this bill to protect the rights of citizens and subjects of foreign countries can not be put in a false attitude by being charged as unfaithful to the trust imposed upon them to conserve the interests of our country. For the first time in the history of the Government this bill seeks to allow the representatives of foreign governments to exercise the sovereignty of those foreign governments on the territory of the United States without any control whatsoever by any department of the Government.

Mr. SHERLEY. What control or sovereignty is there where you can not compel a man to enlist and where he does so voluntarily?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, well, if there is any purpose in this bill we well know that the foreign recruiting officers will by representations try to induce men to enlist when by voluntary action they would not. Otherwise the chairman of the committee reporting this bill would be willing to accept the most reasonable amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] to supervise the enlistment under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe. I ask the gentleman what objection can there be to having the work of these foreign enlisting officers supervised by your own Secretary of War, or are you going to allow them carte blanche to come into this country, establish recruiting stations here, and placard our streets as they placard the streets of their own countries with posters, "Stand by the King"; "Stand by the Czar"; "The King needs you"?

Ah, gentlemen, there is something more to be considered than merely providing authority that these foreigners may be given permission to go and fight for their respective countries.

There is the question of the feelings of our own people. We know, and we can not disguise it, that there has been in this country descendants of citizens of foreign countries who have sympathized with the Government now our enemy, but those descendants have put aside their sympathies since our country has declared war and have declared that they are now first, last, and all the time for this country. Are you willing, in view of their past sympathy, to allow the flags of foreign governments to be flaunted in their faces and have posted throughout our cities placards with "Stand by your king; stand by your foreign land"? I say that we should place in this bill such a reasonable amendment so that if the foreign officers usurp their privileges the Secretary of War, or some officer of the Government, will be able to keep them within proper limits of recruiting, and not allow them to exercise a power so drastic that would compel ignorant foreigners to enlist without knowing the full consequences.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think that all voluntary enlistments could be had through the foreign consuls?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no serious contest here against permitting the citizens of foreign countries to enlist if they are willing. The opposition that has developed here to-day generally has been to the exercise or the abuse of those privileges that are sought to be vested in foreign recruiting officers by this bill. We have no right to assume, when the chairman of the committee declines any amendment such as was suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], that they want to grant to these officials of foreign Governments carte blanche to do that which they have no right to do. We are amending a law that has been on the statute books for more than a hundred years, one of the laws of neutrality that writers on international law have commended. There is no serious objection to allowing foreigners domiciled here to voluntarily enlist, but we should not surrender to foreign officers without proper safeguards the right to enlist their own nationals for foreign military service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to think that there is a good deal of unwisdom about this proposed legislation. I am inclined to believe that we ought to follow the recommendation of the President of the United States when he said to the American people a day or two ago that every person within the confines of America should keep themselves busy in such activity as will bring the best results to the Nation.

Now, I apprehend that among the things we need the most in a crisis like this is to keep the industries of the country going, to raise sufficient crops to feed the American people. We need the men in the coal mines, we need them in the copper mines, we need them on the railroads, we need them on the farm; and you can all say what you please about the importance of allowing men who have not become citizens of the United States to depart; I contend that it is only because of the fact that we have this class of men in the United States that our industries have been able to keep pace with the progress of the Nation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that there are now proceeding across the Dominion of Canada 50,000 coolies from China, to be followed by another 50,000, to do the scullion work in France? That is how they are proposing to do their work; but Chinese are not permitted to come here.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; it has been suggested to me in numerous letters from Americans who are descendants of ancestors that first settled on American soil that the conditions of the country are such that it might be wise even now to allow Japanese and Chinese to come in and be distributed throughout the States of the Union in order to do the work that we ourselves find necessary to have done. I do not agree with them, but that is the sentiment which is growing continually from day to day.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HILL. I have not studied the bill, but I presume the gentleman has. The President of the United States advocates conscription, and I think we have got to come to it if the war lasts any length of time. Is there anything in the bill of a reciprocal nature so that in case we come to conscription we can go to the territory of a foreign Government and bring back our citizens in that territory?

Mr. MADDEN. There is nothing in the bill that gives the American Government any right to do that; it simply enlarges the rights of foreign countries.

Mr. HILL. In the Civil War a great many of our citizens went to Canada. If they go there now, there is nothing reciprocal in this bill which would allow us to bring them back.

Mr. MADDEN. No; you can not bring them back unless they pass laws in that country authorizing us to do what we are authorizing them to do now. I believe it is the right of these men to remain on American soil, and if the hour comes when conscription is needed we can conscript them whether they are nationals of some other country or American citizens. I believe we ought to preserve the right of every man who shows himself to be loyal to America to remain in America during this crisis so that we may be able to run our munition factories at full speed, so that we may run our railroads without interruption, and so that we may be able to maintain the tracks and roadbeds of the railroads over which our trains are run.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is it true that this Government has the right to conscript the nationals of other nations that may be here?

Mr. MADDEN. I think so, though I am not a lawyer.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I wanted to know what the gentleman's authority was.

Mr. MADDEN. I stated that we have, and the information upon which I base that statement comes from men whom I believe to be the best constitutional lawyers in America.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Would it not be better to have this bill behind an Army draft bill?

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me it would be.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. So as to give them a chance to get into the American Army first?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. LANGLEY. Is not the spirit of this bill in conflict with the President's appeal to the country the other day on the matter of increased production, because it will tend to decrease the power of the country to do what the President asks?

Mr. MADDEN. I think so. It is doing exactly the opposite of what the President of the United States has asked the American people to do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD].

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I do not believe that any Member of this body is opposed to any alien going out of the country to fight for his own country. This bill was presented on Saturday afternoon, very late. No man, or few, had any knowledge of its provisions save those of the committee that had drafted it. Few copies were available. The discussion that occurred then I think was for the purpose of clarifying the minds of the Members present. So unusual a bill brought in at such a time, under such circumstances, seemed to require a little bit of discussion. I am not opposed to aliens going beyond seas who still in heart hold their allegiance to a foreign government, but there is a large body of Americans who, in heart at least, are loyal to this country to whom a great injury might be done. I do not rise to oppose the bill, but I do feel deeply the need of carefully safeguarding its provisions, so that men who have been here for 12 or 15 years, who have been negligent about taking out their first papers and have done so recently, who are yet loyal in heart to this country, many of them having participated in municipal and State and national affairs, many of them having voted again and again, may not have pressure brought upon them which would make it very difficult for them or cause dissension in many communities.

If the principle of selective conscription is correct in the Army bill which is about to be introduced, I suggest that perhaps selective recruiting might be worthy of our attention. While much has been said with regard to the mine and the factory, it is yet true that in all the agricultural districts where the raising of beets for sugar production is carried on it is done almost wholly by foreign labor, much of which has not yet been naturalized. I confess that when I first read the bill there arose before me the picture of a recruiting officer in full dress, with the flag of his country floating over the recruiting office, and I wondered if, after all, it might not produce in some parts of the country a difficulty of which we little dream at present. There are places where the feeling runs high; and, then, I remember, too, that if there are no restrictions upon this bill it might be that a recruiting officer, going to the ignorant, speaking his language, would be able to bring such pressure to bear as that the man would not freely and voluntarily go but would mentally at least feel as though he was compelled to go.

This bill does not claim to be a conscription bill. It's advocates insist that the enlistment under it will be purely voluntary. Personally I am willing that every reservist in this country who belongs to any country with whom we are associated in this war should be called to the colors of that country. This is our war, and whatever is best to be done that we may speedily bring it to a close meets my hearty approval. Indeed, it would be very strange if the men who are thinking seriously of favoring conscription for our own citizens should offer any objection against foreign Governments conscripting their own subjects. My hope is that we shall not be in such haste that many people, at heart Americans, may not freely offer themselves in the service of this country in the full confidence that their every right will be protected.

With two of the countries now leagued with us in this war we have no treaty of naturalization. The question of dual citizenship has arisen. There are many men in this country who hold themselves to be citizens of the United States either by virtue of having been born in this country or having taken out their first papers. How the courts will hold in this matter is not known to me. The bill should be so explicit that these people, who are American at heart and who are perfectly willing to fight under our flag, should be amply protected. I am most heartily in sympathy with every effort of the administration to bring this war to a successful close, and shall only stipulate that the law shall be properly safeguarded.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, may I ask how much time has been used upon the other side?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has 20 minutes remaining, and there are 50 minutes remaining on the side of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman desire to go on now?

Mr. GARD. I was wondering if the gentleman from Pennsylvania cared to use all of his time now?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No.

Mr. GARD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, this is a perfectly proper measure, with the amendment which the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] will add, to provide against the enlistment of American citizens, and with that amendment it ought to pass. As gentlemen recognize, it is an amendment to our foreign enlistment act. You may recall that the foreign enlistment act was passed in 1818, nearly a hundred years ago. The present section of the Criminal Code is the language of section 2 of that act of April 20, 1818, literally, down to the proviso, which appears in section 2. At the time of the original passage of the act it contained a proviso which is rather involved in language, but the purport of which is that nations at peace with the United States may always enlist their own citizens or subjects in the United States. In the Revised Statutes of 1878 that proviso disappeared.

The purpose of the present proviso is more limited than the original act, in that it only permits a nation to enlist its own citizens and subjects when two conditions concur: First, that we are at war with a country; and, second, that the country which proposes to enlist its own citizens in the United States shall also be at war with the same country. Under these circumstances, of course, this power is only coextensive with the existence of the war, and it does seem to me that it is highly proper and necessary that the citizens of countries who are at war with the same enemy we are should be permitted to enlist their own subjects, even though they be temporarily within the United States. We have always been in the very forefront of the nations in regard to neutrality laws, and I have been somewhat shocked and surprised at the attitude of certain critics of the administration and certain critics of the press that we were violating acknowledged principles of neutrality. We have maintained more neutrality laws and enforced them more strictly than any other country that the world has ever seen, and this section is one of the strict neutrality laws of the United States. It was passed in the year 1818 at a time when four-fifths of the great Western Hemisphere was nominally subject to the King of Spain, and all of it was in the fire of revolt. Thus the law was passed to prevent filibustering expeditions against Spain of American citizens and by American citizens upon American soil taking part in a Spanish-American revolution. That was its main purpose, and, I am frank to say, its only purpose. Certainly, it has been practically its only force during all of the 100 years it has been in existence, to prevent filibustering expeditions. Never should we undertake to prevent legitimate, authorized officers of a friendly government from enlisting their own citizens in a war in which they are engaged.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Was not this law used to stop Canadian officials coming to the Army posts of the United States to solicit men who would have joined our Army less than two years ago?

Mr. BORLAND. It was used for that purpose, no doubt, and, as it is constructed and carried out, it is strictly applicable; but, in my judgment, it goes beyond any such law of any country on earth. Gentlemen now say we might conscript these foreigners. I have not examined that question with very much care, but I will undertake to say we could not conscript a foreigner, a citizen, the subject of a friendly Government without having that Government consent——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BORLAND. In a moment. Let us look at the other side. Suppose an American temporarily was residing abroad. Would we permit him to be conscripted or imprisoned or detained on account of any laws of that country proceeding against a foreign foe? We would not think of permitting it for a moment. We would not submit to the conscription of an American citizen abroad or to his punishment for failure to be conscripted in a foreign army. That being true, I take it that a friendly Government would take the same position in regard to us. If we were to undertake to conscript the subjects of Great Britain or France in this country we would have to do it by the express or implied permission of those Governments.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. We did conscript during the Civil War, and no Government except Great Britain protested against it, and they withdrew the protest.

Mr. BORLAND. I take it it would be a matter of diplomatic protest.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield some of his time?

Mr. GARD. A member of the committee [Mr. VOLSTEAD] indicated that the gentleman's side would yield him five minutes and I will yield him the same amount. I will be very glad to yield the gentleman an additional five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] five minutes.

Mr. GARD. I yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I do not expect to occupy the 10 minutes allotted me. It has been insinuated, if not directly charged, that there is something suspicious in the method by which the committee has urged the passage of this bill. There certainly is nothing to justify suspicion. It was brought to us through the regular channels. We were urged by the administration to pass it. It seemed to the Judiciary Committee from the evidence submitted that legislation of this kind was desirable and that it was in proper form. Perhaps the committee did not take as much care in considering the exact language of the proviso, which is the new feature of this legislation, as it ought to have done, but from a consideration of it now I am unable to see that there is anything seriously wrong about it. However, I shall offer an amendment, if I have the opportunity, for the purpose of making a little clearer some features of it. The bill is offered here in good faith and should receive careful consideration. Under the present law no one can solicit any foreigner to enter the army or the navy of the nations engaged with us in the present war, nor can any foreigner while in this country enlist for such foreign service. He may, of course, go to his own country if he wishes, and there enlist, but he pays his own expenses in going from this country to the country where he can legally enlist. Why should not we give these people an opportunity to enlist here? Why not allow the foreign government to pay that expense? Oh, they say, we need these people here. Yes; but we need them at the front just as much as we need them here, and many of these men would be good soldiers if they could go to their own country and there enlist, or enlist here under the provisions of the bill which is pending. They may be better soldiers in the foreign army than they would in our Army.

Many of them are unable to speak the English language. They would be there among their own people, speaking the language of their country, fighting for their own friends and relatives. It seems to me we ought in every way to facilitate the opportunity for these men to enlist, so they may become a force to fight our battles. It seems to me we ought not to hesitate for a moment in passing this measure. I do not care though a foreign diplomat may have suggested this bill. We have no reason to believe that it was so suggested; but why should not a foreign diplomat be permitted to suggest to this Government that there is a large force of his countrymen here who probably could be enlisted to go and support their native country and who at the same time would be upholding the hands of our Government. It seems to me we ought to be glad of such a suggestion, and not on that account hesitate to pass this bill. [Applause.] We can not afford to haggle about these things If we are going to allow petty prejudices to interfere with the legislation that is needed in this emergency, we will never pass any laws and we shall never be prepared to face the enemy. It seems to me that it is for us to stand together and in a case like this let the judgment of the administration, which has considered this matter, have large weight with us, if not a controlling weight.

I want to offer an amendment, but I do not happen to have it handy.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I suggest to the gentleman that that should be done later.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I desired to have it read.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did not yield to the gentleman to offer an amendment, as that would not be in order now.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I did not intend to have it offered at this time, but I wanted to call attention to it. The amendment I have drawn carefully guards against anyone being enlisted through compulsion. It provides that the enlistment must be voluntary and the solicitation must be for voluntary enlistment in the army or navy of a foreign country in war with a country with which we are at war.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SMALL). The Chair suggests that the gentleman read the amendment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will send it to the desk and have it read. It also provides that the enlistment shall be subject to the control of the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, after the word "years" strike out the proviso and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided, That a citizen of any foreign country which is at war with any country with which the United States is at war may voluntarily enlist or be solicited so to enlist in the army or navy of the country of which he is a citizen, but such enlistment and solicitation shall be subject to such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is on the Committee on the Judiciary, by which this bill was reported. Was there any information before the committee as to what should be done with the families or the dependent wives and children of such of the aliens as might be taken away?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There was not; but why should there have been? Whenever we take our own boys we may have to pay a pension; and may make other provision. If these men voluntarily enlist it seems to me they would only do so in case they have some way of providing for their families.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is not the situation entirely different? What claim has the alien family upon the United States, except possibly upon the municipal authorities?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The alien family has practically the same claim as the citizen's family. When a man becomes domiciled in this country, I have no doubt he can be conscripted just the same as a citizen. He is subject to the laws of the country and reaps practically all the benefits of our institutions the same as a citizen. I have no doubt, if a lot of those men go to the front and leave families here, we will take care of them the same as we take care of our own, and they have the same claim for support from their own Government as our soldiers have upon our Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What provision, if any, has been made to protect an alien who has not voluntarily enlisted, but who has been forced through a misstatement of facts or physical force to enlist?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. This bill only authorizes voluntary enlistment. If a citizen of this country is induced by misrepresentation or fraud to enlist, as some of them have been in the past, he can find no particular statute for his protection. He must look for relief to the law applicable to citizens generally. I assume that those foreigners are not any more ignorant or more likely to be imposed upon than thousands of our own citizens. Why should they not be willing to submit to the same conditions as our own citizens must? We are doing the best we can to guard them. We may have to send our soldiers beyond the ocean; their children may lose their fathers; mothers may become widows as a result, and many other things may occur that we all will regret exceedingly; but can we stop to count the cost in any such fashion as the gentleman suggests? This is the time for action; this is not a time to quibble. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I am for the measure. He has yielded me time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is wholly within his rights in declaring himself for the measure.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the gentleman was opposed to it, and therefore I thought I should say that to him.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The purpose of this opposition was to permit discussion. The House ought to discuss matters of such grave importance.

Mr. BUTLER. I am obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, while this discussion is taking place I am thinking somewhat about our own children. I am told that in Europe there is a slaughter pen 600 miles in length, and in it is plenty of room for more. I am perfectly willing that men who are trained and are willing to make these battles shall take the place that your sons, my sons, and the sons of Americans must take if they do not take and our American sons must supply if they fail.

Among these men in this country who are not its citizens, I am told, are many soldiers, men who have been trained by the nations to which they now owe allegiance, men well trained for battles of the description now being fought, men who are able and well qualified at this time to take the field more to the front. Why should they not do it? We have worked in this country, Mr. Speaker, for 20 years, to my own knowledge, in persuading our own people to join the military forces of the United States. This gives to our allies the only opportunity that we have had heretofore. It gives them that which they are now, perhaps, denied.

We must remember that in voting on this bill we are voting not only for them but for ourselves. We must recall this, that these people, these nations, are our allies, and we have joined with them in making common battle, which we did not provoke. This war was made by other nations than by ourselves. These men are subjects of nations which made this war. We were dragged into it unwillingly.

I have voted willingly to sustain the President of the United States in acceptance of this war forced upon us—I mean the resolution recognizing war conditions. So far as it concerns me, every attempt, however feeble it may be, that lies within my power will be made by me to help him until this war is over. [Applause.]

I do not know whether this bill is wise or not. The President says it is. He ought to know. I do not know whether it is properly drawn. The President's law officer, the Attorney General, says that it is. He ought to know. But, Mr. Speaker, I do know this, that if every Member of this House proposes that his opinion shall prevail here we shall accomplish nothing. What we need is unity in the presence of our enemy. We ought to show to the world that we have confidence in the administration that is to prepare for these battles. What it needs it ought to have without grudging.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does not the gentleman think that this bill, with a report 14 lines long, attempted to be shot through the House on short notice and then brought up in this fashion to-day shows the absolute necessity of a committee on the conduct of the war, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]?

Mr. BUTLER. I want to be entirely polite to my friend. I do not think anything about it. I have become absolutely submissive. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will ask the gentleman another question, if he will yield.

Mr. BUTLER. I can not yield. I have yielded to the gentleman because I wished to be civil toward him, thinking highly of him. I propose to be absolutely submissive. What this country needs in a time like this is concert of action and cooperation of the allies in a manner calculated to bring this war to a hasty and successful conclusion, and I shall stand for the measure because the responsibility for its appearance is not upon me. I have no doubt that it is necessary, in the judgment of the President; furthermore, that it is wise, in his judgment, that the officers or the authorities of these foreign countries, our allies, shall have the chance to persuade their people to return—their soldiers to return—to fight these battles.

I repeat what I said. We have never employed any other method since the days of the Civil War except persuasion. If we are allowed to persuade our own people to become soldiers, why should not the foreigners, our allies, be permitted to persuade their men to return? [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, we are all hoping that we will not have to take our places in the slaughter pens abroad. The doors are open and vacancies are being created to-day; but if this war goes another year, our sons, the young men of America, will have to enter. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN rose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did the gentleman obtain his time from the other side?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I did not obtain time. I did not understand the situation. I would like to know what the situation is.

Mr. WEBB. We will have only two or three more speeches on this side.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did the gentleman yield time to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I did not understand the situation and I merely asked for information.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I agreed to recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] first.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, very candidly it seems to me that the opposition to this measure is conjured out of the hysteria of fear of some unknown, something not understood by the opponents of the measure, and, of course, therefore not fairly explicable. When they try to explain their opposition they are soon all at sea or all in the air. The thing that we need as a Congress and as a Government to-day and for all the time that the war shall last is the quintessence of common sense and the absence, as far as may be, of hysteria and groundless, formless fears.

The simple fact about this bill is this: We have on our statute books to-day a law forbidding our people from enlisting or people of foreign nationals from enlisting in this country in the armies of such foreign nations, and every man who knows the existence of that law knows that it ought not to be there to-day. We forbid by law the nationals of England, France, Italy, and Russia, who are allies of ours, from soliciting the support of their own people who are in our country.

This bill in simple effect proposes to repeal the existing provision, so that the Frenchman may appeal to the Frenchmen in this country to enlist in the French Army under the French flag; and the Englishman and the Italian and the Russian may do likewise; and I submit to our common sense that the Italian, the Russian, the Frenchman, the Englishman in this country is really more directly concerned in the conduct and fortunes of that war than we are, and that is common sense.

We, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] a moment ago said, were reluctantly drawn into this war, and God knows I am willing to admit that it was with reluctance that my country went into it, so far as I was concerned, and nothing but the stern belief that the rights and dignity and self-respect of our country and the good opinion of the world as well as our own are involved causes me to be willing to go into it. No; when it comes to the nations whose slaughter pen is over yonder it seems to me that the son of Italy, the son of France, would feel that this country ought to lift the prohibition against his enlisting in this country and ought to be willing that his nation should bear his expenses to take him to the battle field; that his nation should invite him to go; that his nation should raise its flag above his head when he does go; and that his nation should take care of his family also if he does go.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this is a simple action that ought to have been taken as soon as we left the ranks of the neutrals. As to the allegation that it has been hurried, only he who seeks a mare's nest can find any in the fact that only 14 lines are submitted as the report in support of this measure. It needs no 14 lines. It is a simple action permitting nationals of the nations at war as our allies to enlist their sons, though they be in America; and for that reason it seems to me it is plain and simple and ought to be adopted without a dissenting vote. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, the citizens of other countries resident in this country in time of peace do not recognize this Government to protect them in any of their rights that they enjoy here when they can have a superior right from their own government. This is exemplified in the various cases of riots in which the nations having their people here have demanded redress from our Government. On February 15 of this year, at the request of the Governments of Austria-Hungary, Greece, and Turkey, on account of injuries inflicted upon their own citizens, I reported favorably to the Committee on Foreign Affairs a report carrying $41,030 on account of injuries to their citizens while resident in this country.

If the long arm of government of a foreign power reaches to our shores to protect these men in times of peace, why not, if this obligation rests upon the foreign government to defend them in time of peace, is there not some obligation on the part of these citizens to their own governments in time of war? They owe allegiance somewhere. If they do not admit that they owe it to this Government then they must admit that they owe it to some other government. Their allegiance as individuals to some government can not cease at any period of time. They must owe it to some country at all times, and the citizens of this country have not the same rights and powers of protection from those foreign governments that the residents here of foreign countries have. If therefore they are allowed to invoke the power of the foreign government to protect them and to get them money consideration in time of peace, if they are willing to ask that the strong arm of their government come in and take them out of our courts and give them certain money consideration when there is no war, then when war does come and that same power needs them at home will our country stand in the way and say, "We will give to you as individuals what your government demands in time of peace, but we will protect you from your government when an obligation arises on your part as one of its citizens?" This bill merely gives the right to that government to exact that allegiance which is due from that citizen, as the citizen who resides here exacts protection from that government as one of its people residing abroad. There can be no duty on the part of a government to an individual unless there be some duty on the part of the individual to the government.

The time has come now when all countries are demanding this duty of good citizens, and good citizens here will not invoke this Government to protect them from their duty to other countries abroad, and this Government should not protect here bad citizens of other countries who are not willing to perform the duty they owe. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania use some of his time now?

Mr. GARD. How much time have we on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand I have 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has 10 minutes.

Mr. WEBB. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, 10 days ago the President signed a joint resolution declaring that the United States was in a state of war with Germany. To-day the conference committees are in session, trying to reach a conclusion as to the bond issue, and when the conclusion is reached, as it will be doubtless in a short time, we will have provided a loan to the allies of $3,000,000,000. That is the first contribution on the part of the United States to bring the war to a speedy close. I think by to-morrow we probably will be called upon to see what we will do in the way of raising an army. Our Navy is under orders, our Army is certainly under orders. War is in existence. We are the sixteenth nation to enter this world war, and we have voted that we will give the strength of men and of money to bring it to an end; and here is a proposition to allow our allies to enlist their own nationals who are here; and while we shall be called upon, either by volunteering or by conscription to get our own boys, I can not understand the consistency of withholding for an instant, with that fact facing us, the right that we ought to grant to these belligerent countries, our allies, to enlist by volunteer service the nationals whom we ourselves can not control in case we do not give it to them. [Applause.]

If we are going to vote the last ounce of influence in men and money, as we will, to bring this trouble to an end, why should we not permit the Governments that are fighting the same battle to come to America and enlist under their flag the men who belong to them, and to allow them to fight along by the side of the boys that we probably will have to send from our own country? If I vote to send an American boy to the battle trenches of Europe, I certainly will vote also to allow the European Governments to send their nationals who are now here to the battle fields of Europe to fight our common enemy at war. [Applause.] We certainly should be as fair to our own sons as to alien residents. It is as fair for one as it is for the other. This bill is not a conscription bill. It is an enlistment bill. It carries the idea of voluntary service. If it were for conscription, then we might hesitate for a time to see what effect it might have. It then might raise delicate problems which are not involved in the present bill as drafted.

I voted 10 days ago that we were in a state of war. I supported 5 days ago this loan and this bond issue. I will vote when the time comes to raise an American army. I will vote now to allow the alien residents in this country to be enlisted to fight for the principles for which we are fighting. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] a member of the committee.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the suggestion of hurry or lack of consideration has crept into this debate. When the bill was brought up last Saturday it was sought to be brought up by unanimous consent, and to-day it is up for the consideration of the House in its regular place on the calendar call. It has come in its proper and appointed way, an orderly and not a hurried way.

I believe that there are two things to be accomplished for good by this bill. In the first place I want to say that I am in favor of retaining in America all persons of foreign birth admissible under our laws who come here with good intent and with the purpose to make of themselves law-abiding American citizens. I realize, as everyone must, that our industries, our railroads, our public works demand men who can perform manual labor, and I would have every proper person who comes with good intent to be an American citizen; but I think one of the menaces that confront our American institutions is the keeping in small groups of people of foreign nationality who retain un-American ideas, who do not seek to take up with American ways of living. Therefore it would seem to me that the first thing we want to impose upon those who are foreign born who come to America is that they shall learn of our institutions, that they shall acquaint themselves with our form of government, and that they shall become Americans in fact and not remain alien residents of America. I think this because not alone in our industrial interests but in the great development of our civilization we want it understood that America welcomes all who come with good intent. If they do not care to come within the Government of America, if they care to remain outside, if they do not avail themselves of our great advantages, if they do not want to become American citizens, if they stay here in the United States of America and yet remain subjects of a foreign monarchy then I say that the first duty of American citizens is to see that these men are made responsive to the government to which they adhere. And so when we come to the great question of preserving our national defense and asserting American rights I would say that I welcome the foreign-born man fighting for the defense of the United States. But if a foreign-born man does not care to do that, if he prefers to maintain allegiance to a foreign king or crown, then I say to him, "Go back and fight for the country to which you do proffer your allegiance!" [Applause.]

There is only one possible objection I can see to the administration of this bill, and that is an objection which I regard as fanciful, and yet I would remedy even that. The objection has been made that the recruiting sergeants of other governments will appear in this country, and that they will demand service of those who are ignorant of the English language and of American ways. It seems to me, in all deference to those who make this assertion, that the Italian, the Roumanian, the Pole, the Slav, the people of different nationalities who come here speedily inform themselves; that they speedily seek to get within the purview of American institutions. They understand the freedom for which they come to America, and they are competent to make choice of allegiance. So the only suggestion I would make is that the interest of these people be safeguarded in the best possible way by seeing that the recruiting, the solicitation for enlistment, be under the control of the Secretary of War of the United States. I believe it to be the best policy that the Government of the United States through its responsible officers, as the Secretary of War, should have at least a supervisory interest in the method and in the enlistment and solicitation in order to provide the last word for the protection of aliens in our country. If such an amendment is offered, I shall support it. With that amendment I believe the bill is perfectly safeguarded and is a measure that should be passed by the House of Representatives immediately. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, it is hard for me to analyze the arguments made by some of the opponents of this bill. As I read its provision, and compare it with the present law, it is identically the same law, with the exception of the proviso attached to the proposed bill.

I do not know how many aliens there are in this country, and I do not suppose anyone else has an accurate knowledge of it, but if these people have come to this country for the purpose of enjoying liberty, as has been argued here to-day, if is a peculiar thing to me, if they love our country so much, that they have not taken out first citizenship papers. [Applause.] If they really desire to fight under the American flag instead of under their own flag, why have they not done something toward taking out citizenship papers in order to give them a chance to fight under the Stars and Stripes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman from Indiana think that this bill protects those that have taken out their first papers?

Mr. COX. I suppose it does; I think so beyond all question. It is attempted here on the part of some men to keep these men who have come to this country from enlisting in this war either under the American flag or under their own flag. Are men willing to vote that American-born boys shall be sent to the trenches in foreign lands, and foreigners who come here for the sole purpose of enjoying American life and liberty, who have refused to take out citizenship papers, shall remain here? [Applause.] That is a peculiar American doctrine to me, a doctrine that I never heard of in all the history of my life. It is not the true American spirit under any circumstances whatever. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the law, limited as it is to voluntary enlistment, delay for one moment——

Mr. COX. If it does not do it—the gentleman wants to protect a few Italians from going back to their own country. What did they come here for? Why do not they go back and stay there?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. COX. I have answered it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman would not listen to the question.

Mr. COX. I would go further, and if these men would not volunteer in this country—how are we going to get them to volunteer under their own flag? If an Italian or a Jew or a Gentile comes here from abroad and is not willing to shed his life blood on foreign soil in the trenches in France, it comes with a poor grace for any Member of Congress to stand on the floor of the House and say he is willing to vote for conscription to send American-born boys over there. [Applause.] I do not believe in that spirit of Americanism at all; it does not appeal to me.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK].

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, it has become so evident that there will be amendments to this bill to protect those who might suffer from misrepresentation, and so much has been said in support of the bill that I shall not take the five minutes allotted to me. It is evident that the amended bill ought to pass and pass promptly in order that, under proper regulation, the agents of the allied governments may canvass among their nationals in this country to the end that there may be increments to the armies in France, in Flanders, in Italy, with the minimum of delay—such increments as now can be made only by permitting the service of the nationals of European countries—men already trained to arms who will be ready to go to the fighting lines before any force trained in this country can be ready. Amended as the bill will be I shall vote for it. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How much time, Mr. Speaker, remains on this side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia). Three minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will yield that time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER].

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, I perhaps represent as many of these aliens that come under the provisions of this bill as there is in any one district in the United States. I do not believe that it is unpatriotic or that it is unbusinesslike for us to reason out such a proposition as is presented here, a new proposition, that many of us do not know how it will work out.

Now, I know something of the padrone system; I know something of the ways of life of many of these foreign people, and I do not believe it would be fair to turn recruiting officers from foreign countries into the section of the city of Chicago that I represent without Congress making some regulatory provision regarding their acts. Many of these aliens do not know the laws of this country, nor will the recruiting officers in many cases who will come here from Europe to recruit these people know our laws. It seems only wise, and it may be good judgment, for Congress to delegate to some power the regulatory features proposed in the amendments offered and which I believe ought to be retained by the Secretary of War or the Congress of the United States.

There is a great deal of loud talk here made on the presumption that these people will not join the United States Army. I believe we will get more of them to join the United States Army than will go abroad to fight under the flag of the country they left—more by a great many hundreds. These people came here to better their condition, they came here for liberty, and it is not fair to presume that they will not go into the Army of the United States and fight to maintain the flag of the United States. I do not feel that I ought to oppose this measure, but from my experience with aliens I want to impress Congress with the fact that we have thousands and thousands of these people in my district, and that we ought to have some power to whom I can go and claim redress if I find that these recruiting officers are not living up to the laws of the country. We would lose nothing by the adoption of such an amendment; it is simply a precaution.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this Congress will have some confidence in my statement when I say that these people ought to be given some protection to keep them out of the hands of sharpers and a cruel system that has long been maintained in this country among them. If you do not know what the padrone system is, if you do not know how these foreigners are gulled and imposed upon, if you do not know that there are a lot of their own countrymen who are living off these people as a result of the unfortunate conditions that the foreigner finds himself in here, men who will take every advantage of such conditions, then you have a lot to learn, and it is because such things do exist that I believe it is essential that Congress should rely upon my statement as a matter of protection, and I am satisfied if you adopt the amendment providing that the Secretary of War be given power of regulation in this act it will prove of benefit.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLAGHER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the United States is known as the melting pot of the world, filled with aliens of every kind, is it not probable that this war will be the fire that burns under the pot and unites the aliens, and is it not more than likely that nine out of ten of those who are here will enlist in the United States Army the minute the call comes?

Mr. GALLAGHER. I have always believed that they would do that, and believe so now, and I have never given any credence to many of the speeches that have been made here during our consideration of the immigration bill that they only come here to help themselves. I believe that it is as essential to the progress of this country that these people stay here as it is that they be put on the firing line abroad if you want to conserve our food supply. Nearly all of the roadbeds or trackage of the railroads in this country is maintained by these foreigners. Thousands of them are employed in the mills and in the factories and in the mines and on the farms, but if it is the sense of Congress that they ought to be allowed to go back home for military service I shall not object to it, but I do believe that we ought to have some regulatory amendment added to this law. It will make it a better law. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have read through this bill two or three times, and I can see nothing wrong with it. So far as I understand it from reading, and as I remember the explanation of it by the chairman of the committee that reported it, it merely proposes to permit the representatives of Governments that are our allies at this moment in a serious war to come here and invite the enrollment in their armies of aliens who were formerly residents in England, France, Italy, and Russia. That is the substance of the bill. These people do not have to go back if they do not wish to. They can remain in their railway employment or in the mines referred to by Mr. CANNON, if they prefer to; but it gives them the opportunity to enlist with their own people, with their own families, with people of their own language, and in the country from which they came. It is merely an opportunity for our allies to accept service that they may voluntarily be given. I quite agree with the suggestion made by my friend from Illinois, Mr. GALLAGHER, that that enlistment, that enrollment, and the solicitation of recruits by officers of other countries should be done under very wise regulations put forward for its control by our Government.

But, Mr. Speaker, what I took the floor for particularly was to enter a mild protest against an observation of my most excellent and highly esteemed friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BUTLER. Eternal vigilance is still the price of liberty, and liberty is never so imperiled as when the country gives itself over to hysteria. It is then, in periods of excitement, when men's natures are stirred by strong, patriotic emotions, that they relinquish privileges, that they relinquish rights that were gotten only at the cost of centuries of struggle and bloodshed by our ancestors. [Applause.]

I for one think that in days like these, when we are engaged in great and strange enterprises, when we are spending the money contributed by the taxpayers of the country in sums so stupendous that they stagger the imagination, we should keep our heads clear. We should reason calmly then if ever. The gentleman says that he does not think any more; that he is merely submissive. Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with his conclusion that we should present a united front to the enemy, but the very fact that measures are referred to Congress contemplates their consideration by Congress [applause] and a decision of those questions after deliberation and with knowledge of our traditions and of the law. I would not degrade this coequal and coordinate branch of the Government, the Congress of the United States, and this branch of it, coming directly from the people and specifically charged with the protection of their liberties, by saying that we will yield the right to consider questions of vast importance that are submitted to us for consideration. If we yield any of our constitutional privileges, we are poor Americans and seriously jeopardize our liberties. Once the matter has been determined, once the majority of the Congress of the United States has written its will into law, no man will yield readier obedience than I; but until then I assert my right to deliberate, I assert my right to weigh every argument advanced, and I assert my right to exercise my judgment according to my conscience in determining what shall be the law and what shall govern our conduct in all these matters. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, several gentlemen have indicated their purpose to offer amendments to the bill, and I assume that they will have the right to do so when the bill is read for that purpose.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that my object and hope is that at the conclusion of this general debate, which has been, as he knows, very liberal, each Member who desires to do so may offer an amendment and debate the amendment for five minutes on a side and vote upon it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the gentleman's purpose?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So that we will still have debate upon the amendments as they are presented?

Mr. WEBB. Five minutes on each side.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is not the intent of the gentleman to press us so that these amendments may not be offered?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, no; I do not desire to press anything; but I want my friends to cooperate with me in getting the bill voted on as quickly as possible.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the expiration of the time allotted to the gentleman from North Carolina the bill may be read for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of the time heretofore agreed upon this bill may be read under the five-minute rule. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. I would like to add to that, excluding pro forma amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman adds to his request for unanimous consent that pro forma amendments shall be excluded. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN]——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman any time to yield?

Mr. WEBB. I have.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 10 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a minute of my time remains, and in it I would like to ask the gentleman whether the committee would be apt to give consideration to an amendment proposing that there should be no compulsion, having it specifically stated in the bill?

Mr. WEBB. I would be opposed to that, because it is just rewriting what is already in the bill. "Enlistment" precludes "compulsion."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman object to an amendment that would prevent the use of uniforms by these foreign officers engaged in this enlisting and recruiting service?

Mr. WEBB. If we are going to let them come over here to recruit for volunteers we ought not to prescribe what uniforms they should wear. The Secretary of State might make some arrangement as to that; I do not know.

Mr. GARD. Would not the gentleman think the regulation under the control of the Secretary of War would be sufficient?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That might be, if the gentleman will offer such an amendment——

Mr. WEBB. I propose to offer such an amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That the Secretary of War shall have general supervision of this recruiting?

Mr. WEBB. I am going to offer an amendment reading like this: "Enlistments under this proviso shall be under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War." I think that allays any objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is a concession, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. WEBB. It is not a concession, for I stated in the beginning of my argument I had no objection——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The appearance of these officers in uniform in many districts, without any authority from the Department of War, would create consternation and possibly result in riots, because it would be so thoroughly misunderstood by the foreign-speaking population. The Government ought to exercise some control over possible imposters.

Mr. WEBB. I have no fears of that sort, because these recruiting officers will come over here as a matter of comity and as a matter of good feeling on the part of our Government, and they will make arrangement with our Secretary of State and Secretary of War as to how to demean themselves in our various communities.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will bear in mind there is nothing in the bill in regard to police powers. Suppose men impersonating officers of a foreign government should begin this recruiting or seek money or offer money. Who would know? Ordinary officers of the law apparently would not know who was an imposter or who was not.

Mr. WEBB. They could be punished under the law for false pretenses.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think there should be some direct authority from the Secretary of War.

Mr. WEBB. We can punish them as a matter of false pretenses, but we can not provide against everything——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, in the gentleman's time I desire to ask this. I understand the gentleman proposes to accept an amendment transferring authority to the Secretary of War.

Mr. WEBB. No; I propose to offer an amendment saying that enlistments under this provision shall be under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the gentleman read the amendment again?

Mr. WEBB. "Enlistments under this proviso shall be under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War."

Mr. McCORMICK. Would the gentleman be willing to say "enlistments or solicitations."

Mr. WEBB. No; because "enlistments" covers both.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Is the gentleman going to report an amendment that under no circumstances there can be conscription of these foreigners when he knows there is going to be conscription of our own boys?

Mr. WEBB. The bill we have before us does not give the power to conscript or draft; it is voluntary enlistment. We may be compelled later to do what the allied countries have done with the friendly aliens in their territory, gather up these men of foreign birth from allied countries who are subject to military duty and turn them back to their respective Governments according to nationality.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I do.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the gentleman proposes to offer an amendment which will prohibit them from enlisting any of our citizens.

Mr. WEBB. Any American citizen, of course.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Does the gentleman believe under his amendment in case I find these recruiting officers offering money or paying out money that I could make complaint to the Secretary of War?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; complain to the Secretary of War.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Could I go to the Secretary of War?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman one question to get it fixed in my mind thoroughly.

This Government, as I understand it, now has not the power to conscript an alien?

Mr. WEBB. It has the power, but it would be violating international obligations and treaties if we did it. We would have a complaint from every ally government if we undertook to conscript their citizens.

Mr. COX. Of course we have perfect power under the Constitution of the United States to conscript American-born citizens. That is true beyond any question. Now, in order to compel these aliens who have been here for many years enjoying their rights and liberties under the American flag, what would the gentleman think of the proposition of Congress passing a law that would give to any of our allied governments the power to come here on American soil and conscript their men and take them over?

Mr. WEBB. I would oppose that.

Mr. COX. I would not. I would heartily support it.

Mr. WEBB. I am opposed to any foreign government performing any such act of sovereignty on our soil. I might be in favor of gathering all ally subjects or citizens and turning them over to the allied nations and let them conscript them.

Mr. COX. I object to conscripting American citizens and not giving these governments power to conscript theirs.

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FARR. Will aliens be permitted to enlist under our colors?

Mr. WEBB. No; an alien can not be a soldier of the United States. They do take now in the Army aliens who have taken out their first papers.

Mr. FARR. But not unless they have their first papers?

Mr. WEBB. No.

Mr. LOBECK. During the Civil War we took the foreigners into American service?

Mr. WEBB. We have the power to do it now.

Mr. LOBECK. That have not taken out their first papers?

Mr. WEBB. We were then in war among ourselves and not with other nations.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. WEBB. To just a question.

Mr. FESS. Many times it has been expressed that a man who has taken his first papers would be excluded under this bill. Can the chairman of the committee give us a statement of the facts?

Mr. WEBB. I think a man who has taken out his first papers can volunteer under this bill and go to a foreign ally country and fight.

Mr. FESS. But the bill does not include the privilege of an allied power enlisting that man.

Mr. WEBB. I think it would. He is not yet a citizen of the United States. He has only declared his intention.

Mr. FESS. My friend called attention to the Martin Kotsza affair in 1852. Would not that cover that question exactly?

Our War Department announced at that time that a man who had been here a year and eleven months and had taken out his first papers and gone back to Europe, and was seized, had obtained nationality here.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Has the gentleman made any investigation of the law, so that he can say now to the House whether he believes a conscription law would apply to aliens resident in the United States or not?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think it would. It would be a breach of international comity and relations to conscript any subject of a foreign country in the United States.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In case this bill did not become a law there will be no way to reach aliens in the United States?

Mr. WEBB. None whatever at present.

Now, I yield two minutes to my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN. I can not get through in two minutes.

Mr. WEBB. Then I yield to the gentleman three minutes. That is all I have. I wanted to talk myself.

Mr. MORGAN. All right.

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary I voted for a favorable report on this bill. I have now heard it discussed for some hours, and I have heard no objection presented which to my mind should prevent its passage by unanimous vote in this House. After all, this is a question of patriotism, a question of contributing by our legislation in every way possible to carry the war in which we are now engaged to a successful conclusion. I send to the Clerk's desk resolutions adopted at a great patriotic meeting at my home town of Woodward.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of the people of Woodward County, Okla.

Whereas our Nation has been forced into war by acts of the German Empire; and

Whereas our national rights have been ruthlessly violated on land and sea; and

Whereas American lives have been taken and plots formulated to destroy our national existence by two powers which were responsible for the holy alliance 95 years ago, said alliance having been formed for the purpose of destroying all republican forms of government: Therefore we, the citizens of Woodward County, Okla., in mass meeting assembled this 11th day of April, 1917, in the city of Woodward

Resolve—

First. That we approve the action of our President and Congress in their declaration of war on the 4th day of April, 1917, against the German Empire.

Second. That we, as loyal Americans following in the footsteps of our forefathers, hold the enemies of our country to be our enemies, and the flag of our country, the Stars and Stripes, to be the flag for which we will fight.

Third. That we pledge the entire resources of our country, even to the last drop of our blood, the last penny of our wealth, in support of our Government in its efforts to vindicate our national honor and preserve for us and all the world the sacred right of self-government.

Fourth. That we ask our Senators and Representatives to give to the President their hearty support in organizing our Army and Navy to be of the highest efficiency, that our national honor may be vindicated and our future peace and prosperity guaranteed for all time to come.

Fifth. That the chairman of this meeting appoint a committee to present these resolutions to our Senators and Representatives, with the request that they be properly presented to the President of the United States and to both Houses of our National Congress as embodying the unanimous sentiment of the people of Woodward County, regardless of the countries of our birth and irrespective of our political affiliations.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print the resolution passed by one other city in my district, in connection with this article.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing one other resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa objects.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I presume all time has expired.

The SPEAKER. All the time has expired.

Mr. WEBB. I desire to offer the following amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill and then report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 10 of chapter 2 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909, be amended so as to read as follows: "SEC. 10. Whoever, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, enlists or enters himself, or hires or retains another person to enlist or enter himself, or to go beyond the limits or jurisdiction of the United States with intent to be enlisted or entered in the service of any foreign prince, State, colony, district, or people as a soldier or as a marine or seaman on board of any vessel of war, letter of marque, or privateer shall be fined not more than $1,000 and imprisoned not more than three years: Provided, That this section shall not apply to citizens or subjects of any country engaged in war with a country with which the United States is at war."

Mr. WEBB. Now, Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WEBB: At the end of the bill strike out the period and add the following: "unless such citizen or subject of such foreign country shall hire or solicit a citizen of the United States to enlist or go beyond the jurisdiction of the United States with intent to enlist or enter the service of a foreign country. Enlistment under this proviso shall be under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, that amendment does that one thing, and that thing only, and it makes it perfectly clear that the foreign agents of the allies shall not in any case enlist nor procure or hire any American citizen. We leave that for our own Government to do. The second sentence in the amendment provides that this enlistment shall be under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War.

With those two amendments in the bill, I think we have a bill that everybody can and ought to vote for. I can not understand why a Member of Congress who is in this war to win—and we all are in it for that purpose, and every man is willing to do what he can to make our cause and arms triumphant—I can not understand why a Member should object to the allied countries coming here and by persuasion secure citizens of the allied countries to go back home and fight for the same cause for which a little later we are going to ask our own American boys to fight.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does not the gentleman think, as a matter of fact, that if this amendment is going to be adopted we ought to provide that the regulations should be issued by the Secretary of Labor, in whose department is the Bureau of Immigration, under which these people naturally come?

Mr. WEBB. I will say to the gentleman that I have yielded largely to the sentiment in this House that unless the Secretary of War had supervisory power over the enlistments some wrong would be done. Now, I have offered to put that in the bill. We can trust the Secretary of War just as well as we can trust the Secretary of Labor, and it is in the province of the Secretary of War to supervise enlistments for war purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it not in the province of the Secretary of Labor, who has agents at those places, and who has jurisdiction over those immigrants, and who is conducting night schools for their benefit? Would it not be far better to put this under his supervision?

Mr. WEBB. No. We are not going to allow the Secretary of Labor to say who is to be exempt, and we are not going to allow any Secretary to exempt American boys. If any are to be exempted, they ought to be exempted by this body, the Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will ask the gentleman this further question: Ought not those foreigners who have taken out their first papers to be protected?

Mr. WEBB. They are protected absolutely unless they want to go back and fight. They may volunteer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I suppose that the first-paper men will embrace the first opportunity to get into this army that we are about to raise.

Mr. WEBB. Let them go then.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If we pass this bill we are only inviting trouble, in my judgment.

Mr. WEBB. Well, we have 400,000 available citizens of foreign countries in this country at the present time, who ought to go back and fight for their country and be naturalized here so we can use them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. You have very few foreign born south of Mason and Dixon's line. You have only three-tenths of 1 per cent in the gentleman's own State of North Carolina, and five-tenths of 1 per cent in the State of Mississippi, and six-tenths of 1 per cent in the State of Georgia, and four-tenths of 1 per cent in the State of South Carolina, and a similar proportion elsewhere in the South.

Mr. WEBB. Oh, when the time comes to carry the banner of this country anywhere in the world, according to orders of this Congress, there will be just as many men, in proportion to population from south of Mason and Dixon's line to fight under that banner as from any other part of this country. [Loud applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not dispute that for a moment, and I do not like to raise this issue, and I do not raise it; but has not the gentleman considered the coal-mining industry, and the steel-mill industry, and the fishing industry in the preparation of this bill?

Mr. WEBB. I have only five minutes, and I can not go further into that.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota. Or does the gentleman desire to speak against this amendment that has been offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I offered this as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the LENROOT amendment first and then the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LENROOT: Add to the amendment of Mr. WEBB the following: "And said Secretary may prohibit such enlistment or solicitation of such citizens or subjects who he may determine it is necessary for the public welfare should remain in the United States in productive capacities."

The SPEAKER. Now, the Clerk will report the Volstead substitute, and then we will have all before the House at once.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. VOLSTEAD: Page 2, line 2, after the word "years," strike out the proviso and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That a citizen of any foreign country which is at war with any country with which the United States is at war may voluntarily enlist or be solicited so to enlist in the army or the navy of the country of which he is a citizen, but such enlistment and solicitation shall be subject to such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe."

The SPEAKER. Now, if any gentleman desires to make a speech against the Webb amendment, the Chair will recognize him for five minutes, and if nobody wants to do that the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] for five minutes to argue his own amendment. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], authorizing the Secretary of War to prescribe rules and regulations for enlistment, will not authorize the Secretary of War in those rules to provide that any class of foreign citizens shall be exempt from this enlistment. And for the reasons that I stated in general debate, it seems to me so clear that this power ought to be reposed somewhere that I can not understand why the gentleman from North Carolina should object to it. For instance, when a foreign recruiting officer comes here, the most natural thing in the world will be for him to make as good a showing as possible, to get as many recruits as possible. He is not going to hesitate to go into the shipyards and get skilled labor there if he can. He is not going to hesitate to attempt to recruit sailors if he can. He is not going to hesitate to go into munition factories and get skilled labor there if he can; and unless the amendment I have proposed shall be adopted, there will be no power in this country to say to that recruiting officer that that labor which is absolutely necessary here now in the conduct of the war shall not be recruited by him.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] said a moment ago that he was opposed to granting power to anybody to make class exemptions, and he said Congress ought to do that itself. I want to say to the gentleman that inside of a week he himself will be voting, in the military bill, to give exactly that kind of power to the President of the United States, to a very large degree, and properly so, because Congress can not determine the full details of that classification, and there ought to be power somewhere to say "the country needs that man where he is, rather than to go somewhere else." And so through this power no possible harm can be done. The power is delegated to your own Secretary of War. I am willing to trust him. Are not you? If there is no occasion for the exercise of this power of restricting these enlistments, of making limitations upon them, he will not exercise it; but if it does become necessary in the interest of public safety, in the interest of this war, the Secretary of War ought to have the power to do that thing. So I hope the amendment will be adopted. I sincerely wish it might be accepted by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I had prepared an amendment to take the place of the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], but I shall not offer it. I shall vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, so far as I now can foresee, exactly as it is offered by him. I hardly think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin is necessary. I fear that there will not be an exodus of foreign-born residents of the United States to foreign armies. I do not wish to lay any straw in the way of one of these foreign residents who will promptly go to the front over there to fight the battles that his country is closely interested in, and who may prevent an American citizen going over later. I am willing to take our chances on the industries. I do not believe it desirable to put a provision into the law which will encourage railroad companies, steel companies, packing-house companies, or the other large employers of foreign labor to appeal to the Secretary of War, "Do not let our men go. Send somebody else." [Applause.] I am afraid there will not be enough of them go anyhow. God knows, if they want to go, if they feel that patriotism to their own country from which they came requires that they should offer their lives as a sacrifice, I say God speed them, and let them go. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] desire to be heard?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Just for a few moments. The amendment I offered as a substitute covers exactly the same ground as that offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], with this additional provision: It makes plain that the enlistment must be voluntary. The statute as it will stand, provided the gentleman's amendment is adopted, will simply wipe out the present law as it applies to citizens of the countries engaged with us in this war. It makes no provision whether the enlistment shall be voluntary or involuntary. If I understand it correctly, it simply provides that the present law shall not apply to citizens or subjects of any country engaged in war with any country with which the United States is at war. It simply repeals the act so far as those foreign subjects are concerned. It seems to me that they may be imposed upon. Foreign enlistments are all compulsory, and naturally the same methods will be used here, as far as possible. Why should not we say by our legislation that this enlistment must be voluntary, and that the solicitations must be for voluntary enlistment? That is the one thing that I am trying to secure in this bill by this amendment, and it seems to me we ought to make sure that these foreign recruiting officers shall have no power in any way to compel enlistment. I realize, of course, that they can not absolutely compel them, Because this enlistment must take place in our jurisdiction, where, I assume, no foreign government will be permitted to use force.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. Can this Government conscript these foreigners into the United States Army?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think so. That is, provided they are domiciled in this country and have no home anywhere else. I think they can be made subject to our laws and can be conscripted. I have not given that question any special consideration, but that is my offhand opinion.

Mr. DOWELL. Has the gentleman investigated to ascertain whether or not we have the right to conscript these aliens.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think we exercised that power during the Civil War. I am not sure, but that is my impression. Without going into this matter any further or in any greater detail, I want to impress upon the House that if you vote for the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] you will vote for the same thing that is contained in my substitute, except that my substitute provides that the solicitation must be for voluntary enlistment, and that the enlistment must be voluntary. That is what I am seeking to write into this bill in addition to what the gentleman from North Carolina provides by his amendment.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment, and I ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] to accept it, as I think he possibly will.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that there is already the Webb amendment pending, and there is the Lenroot amendment to that amendment, and the Volstead substitute for the whole thing.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is offering this as an amendment to the substitute.

The SPEAKER. An amendment to the substitute is in order. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. JUUL: After the word "war" in line 5, page 2, insert the following:

"And provided further, That before any enlistments shall be made under this act the foreign enlistment official shall record his name, address, rank, and country with the county clerk of the county where it is proposed to secure enlistments."

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, I hope gentlemen will bear with me if I am unfamiliar with the mode of procedure. I do not mean to embarrass anybody and I do not like to be embarrassed myself. [Laughter.] After I get as well acquainted with you as I was where I came from I will be able to stand the strain a little better. [Laughter.]

Now, this is what is intended by my amendment. You are going to turn loose in this country a number of enlistment officials and you are going to turn loose in this country a number of imitation or spurious enlistment officials. Now, I think all of you gentlemen would want, when our people are annoyed or harassed or hampered by officials of a foreign government, that they at least be genuine officials and that there be a method whereby if friends of yours or mine be annoyed to find out whether the man who pretends to represent a foreign Government is a special representative in fact. I think the least you can ask of foreign officials coming into a city or a village representing themselves to be enlistment officers is to go to the proper official of that county and show their credentials and register, show that they possess the commission from the foreign Government authorizing them to do the act which they claim the right to do.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUUL. Certainly.

Mr. LOBECK. If he got the permission or certificate from the Secretary of War, that would be sufficient, would it not?

Mr. JUUL. That would be sufficient, but let him go to the local official and show his credentials authorizing him to invade a community and show that he is a representative of the foreign Government. You have a way of finding out in your county whether a man is officially credited by your State or county. You are going to be in a position if you do not adopt this amendment where you can not put a check on the foreign official that you are putting on your own citizens.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JUUL. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I suppose the fear that the gentleman has is that the spurious recruiting officer would be levying tribute.

Mr. JUUL. That is what they will do—levy blackmail.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Offering to let men off if they will put up something.

Mr. JUUL. Yes; that is it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. There is great danger of that.

Mr. JUUL. I do not think it is unreasonable to ask any foreign official to show his credentials and properly report to the local authority. You can not in any better way protect the public than by compelling the recruiting officer to record his commission from his Government with the county clerk. I hope the gentleman who is guiding this bill over the shoals will accept the amendment, and I think in the days to come he will thank me for offering it. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will not adopt the Lenroot amendment. If we do it will embarrass the Secretary of War, because the big employers of this foreign labor will be in the office of the Secretary of War morning, noon, and night to show how important it is for the national defense that all of their foreign laborers remain in their workshops.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] is covered by my amendment, except the use of the word "voluntary." Now, there is nothing in the bill that makes it anything but a voluntary enlistment. There is nothing said about conscription or draft, and so it is not necessary to put in that part of the Volstead amendment. You might as well label a side of meat "bacon."

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to ask the gentleman whether he thinks the enactment of this law would not make French soil or Russian soil or Italian soil of that part of our country used by the enlistment officer representing the countries I have indicated?

Mr. WEBB. No; I do not think so; they are simply the agents of the countries and not diplomatic or consular officers.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it not a fact that they would be here under the laws of the country to which they were accredited?

Mr. WEBB. No; they are here under the law that we are passing to-day. We have had a great many agents of foreign countries in this country buying horses and everything else, and there has been no question about foreign soil where they stay. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL] that I agree somewhat with the sentiments he expresses, and there will probably be regulation by the Secretary of War which will cover the very point the gentleman speaks of. He will probably require the foreign agent to enroll in his office, and probably he will be given a certificate that he is a duly accredited recruiting officer, and any man can require the recruiting officer to show his authority or credentials, and I think that will protect my friend's constituents and population.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The gentleman has spoken of enlistments. Will the gentleman allow me to give Webster's definition for enlistment?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. "To enter voluntarily the military service, or the navy, or the like, by formal enrollment."

Mr. WEBB. I thank my friend. That is what I have been contending for all day.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. As it is intended to aid in enlistment of the allies, would it not be well for the chairman to state that he has no objection to a provision in the bill which will be offered to exclude from that portion of the immigration act all those that will voluntarily enlist and go back to Europe and fight the battles of their country? I think it would be no more than right that it should be understood that such an exception should be agreed to.

Mr. WEBB. I would not want to put that in this bill, because it is not an immigration bill.

Mr. SABATH. I think it would aid, assist, and encourage a great many to go and fight if they only knew that they could come back again and will be permitted to enter.

Mr. WEBB. If the gentleman will introduce a bill and have it referred to the Immigration Committee I think he will have no trouble about it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing to accept the bill as it came from the committee and would vote for it as it is. I do not believe any of these changes are going to materially improve the bill, but inasmuch as the gentleman who has charge of the bill has suggested an amendment himself, apparently there is going to be an amendment to it, and that puts us in a position where we ought to accept the best amendment that has been offered. I have studied these various amendments with that interest which all have in so important a measure, and I have been strongly impressed that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] is the one that ought to be adopted, and the only one, because I think it meets all of the objections that have been raised in the way most satisfactory.

Several gentlemen have come in since this amendment was read, and I would like, with the indulgence of the committee, to read it again that we may have it for our information:

Provided, That a citizen of any foreign country which is at war with any country with which the United States is at war may voluntarily enlist or be solicited to so enlist in the army or navy of the country of which he is a citizen, but such enlistment or solicitation shall be subject to such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman heard the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] just read the definition of the word "enlistment"?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is true, and, while it is undoubtedly correct that the word "enlistment" implies the voluntary action, nevertheless it does not hurt the situation to put in the word "voluntary" where it will stand before the eyes of any foreign representative who may come here and who may not be so familiar with our language as he is with his own. The amendment completely makes unnecessary the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL]. That which he proposes is in the nature of a minute regulation, which certainly should not be in the province of Congress to put in the bill. That should be left to the Secretary of War, who shall have charge of the matter, as long as we are going to give him something to do with it. Let me repeat. I think personally we would be best off if we did not try to handicap or surround with limitations the activities that are going to be exerted to secure enlistments of this character, but if we are going to do something let us do it right, and I believe this amendment by Mr. VOLSTEAD answers all of the criticisms that have been raised and is free from many of the things that make some of the others doubtful.

For instance, the amendment which has been proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], if adopted, certainly would be like putting handcuffs and shackles upon a public servant when you are trying to accomplish a good in another way. There is no reason on earth why we should specify just which kind of individuals now will be subject to this enlistment, or who may enlist if they see fit. A year from now—six months from now—conditions may so have changed that the list which now seems to be one we should prescribe ought then to be entirely changed, and we should not write into fundamental law such as this will be such minute details as that. If we are going to regulate it at all, I repeat, let us leave that to the Secretary of War, who can in the exercise of his discretion, given him by the Volstead amendment, make such regulations as will accomplish all that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL] has suggested and all that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has suggested.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. In addition, let me say that it comprehends all that is in the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly, if I have any time.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman could not have understood my amendment. It makes no restriction whatever. It gives the Secretary of War the very power the gentleman contends for.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I listened to the gentleman's speech very carefully, and I assumed that his amendment was drawn in harmony with his remarks.

Mr. LENROOT. It was simply to give the Secretary of War power to do that thing.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And I understood from the gentleman from North Carolina——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the Lenroot amendment.

The question was taken, and the Lenroot amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the Juul amendment to the Volstead substitute.

The question was taken, and the Juul amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the Webb amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, add to the amendment of Mr. WEBB the following: "But nothing herein shall be construed to permit military or naval recruiting officers of foreign countries to engage in recruiting or enlisting men on territory of the United States or any of its possessions."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the LaGuardia amendment to the Webb amendment.

The question was taken, and the LaGuardia amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the Webb amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "States" insert "or a person who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say in connection with this amendment that there are a great many States in the Union—I do not know how many, but Indiana, Texas, and Nebraska certainly—where men who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States are voters after they have lived there for six months, and this amendment simply carries out the idea that they shall continue to be considered citizens of the United States after they have declared their intention to become such. It will be in harmony with the laws of the State where they are permitted to vote.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will those citizens of foreign countries who have merely declared their intention to become citizens of this country be exempted from enlistment or draft by our Government?

Mr. MADDEN. I would not think so. I think when a man declares his intention of becoming a citizen of this country he would be subject to all the laws of the country, and it seems in a great many of the States he is so considered. For example, in Indiana they are permitted to vote and in Texas they are permitted to vote and in Nebraska they are permitted to vote.

Mr. LANGLEY. I think also in the State of Kentucky.

Mr. MADDEN. And the State of Kentucky, I think, has the same law, so to all intents and purposes those States recognize him as a citizen of the United States.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Regarding the right of conscription, let me make this suggestion. Whenever there is a conscription law passed of course the conscription is governed by the terms of the law.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. And it applies usually to citizens of the United States. If those men are not citizens of the United States, they would not be subject to conscription. But let me say this: There is no question whatever that this country in time of war can conscript any person within the jurisdiction of the United States, whether he is a subject of any other country or a citizen of any other country or not. Whether or not that country would consider that as an unfriendly act it is for them to do, but there is to be no question whatever as to our power.

Mr. MADDEN. And there could be no disposition on the part of the allies to consider it an unfriendly act if we conscript men of their nationality who are not citizens of the United States, because when they were not able themselves to enlist those men they would be glad for them to be taken in by conscription or otherwise. I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will see his way clear to accept the amendment I have offered, because I believe it adds to the amendment which he has proposed.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I will have to resist the amendment, because we probably would not conscript a citizen who has only taken out his first papers without violating an international obligation. We would probably have to get the consent of the allied country to do it. Consequently, if we do not allow the ally voluntarily to go to his own country and fight he would find here a neutral zone protecting him both from our Government and the foreign Government, and you could not get hold of him, and I think he ought to have the right, at least, to enlist and go back and fight before——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Did not the gentleman hear the statement of the gentleman from Iowa, who laid down as an established principle that we had the right to conscript aliens?

Mr. WEBB. We probably have not the right, but we have the power.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I understood him to say that we had the right, and I wanted to get the opinion of my friend the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. WEBB. I do not think we have the right under international law and our obligations, and I think we would raise a great furor with foreign Governments if we undertook to do so.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I supposed a question like that would have been settled and that there was absolutely no conflict.

Mr. WEBB. In time of war we have the power to conscript anybody if we desire to take that responsibility, but whether we would do it or not is quite another thing.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I do.

Mr. BURNETT. It might be possible that without violating international obligations the National Government could not conscript, but we have the State militia, the National Guard, where men who have taken out their first papers and have qualified as citizens by the States under those first papers vote and exercise what we regard is the highest privilege of a citizen, they would be subject to the domination of the State regulations.

Mr. WEBB. The War Department allows those citizens to volunteer in the United States Army, and they could either volunteer here or volunteer to go abroad. So far as the amendment I have offered, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say it has been carefully drawn, has been passed upon by the Department of Justice, and the language has been carefully considered.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that the only way the question of our right to conscript these men would be by raising the question of the violation of a treaty, and I do not believe the question of the violation of a treaty would be raised where men have foresworn their allegiance to the Government with which we have that treaty.

Mr. WEBB. I will say to my friend if you adopt that amendment practically all of these foreigners, most of whom ought to have gone back long ago to fight for their country, would swarm in our courts asking for their first papers, and then you would get them in a twilight zone, that has never been settled, as to whether or not we can take them in our Army by conscription without violating our obligations to those foreign countries and——

Mr. MADDEN. We did during the Civil War, and no question was raised except by England, and she afterwards withdrew her objection. The allies, of course, want help——

Mr. WEBB. Let the allies' subjects go back and fight for their own country. If our own citizens are asked to volunteer to fight for these foreigners' country, let them do the same thing.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division on the Volstead substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] demands a division on the substitute.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 136.

So the substitute was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WEBB, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON THE DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints Mr. TALBOTT and Mr. FRENCH, as a Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] yield for a moment?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Can not we make some arrangements about what we will do the rest of the week?

Mr. KITCHIN. We will adjourn over until to-morrow and take up the naval and those other bills on the calendar, and I presume we could then adjourn over until Monday, and the military bill, I understand, will be ready to be introduced to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. Very likely we may be engaged pretty closely next week, and a good many Members would like to know if they could be away Friday and Saturday.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think they could. My intention is to ask to-morrow, when we adjourn, to adjourn over until Monday.

Mr. MANN. Could we reach that agreement to-day?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. Speaker, I will ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent——

Mr. GARDNER. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman expect to dispose of the conference report, if there is one, on the bond bill to-morrow?

Mr. KITCHIN. I hope to do so, if there is no objection to it, to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. LANGLEY. Does the gentleman expect the military bill to come up Monday?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. next Monday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PUNISHMENT FOR DESTRUCTION OF WAR MATERIAL.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill S. 383.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina calls up the bill S. 383, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 383) to punish the destruction or injuring of war material and war transportation facilities by fire, explosives, or other violent means, and to forbid hostile use of property during time of war, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the words "war material" as used herein shall include arms, armament, ammunition, clothing, food, supplies, stores, and all other articles of whatever description requisite to, or intended to be used in connection with, the conduct of war by the United States, as well as all machinery and other articles and accessories required for or connected with the production or manufacture of such war material.

The words "war premises" as used herein shall include all buildings, grounds, mines, or other places wherein such war material is being or is intended to be produced or stored; and all forts, arsenals, navy yards, camps, prisons, or other military or naval stations of the United States.

The words "war utilities," as used herein, shall include all railroads, electric lines, roads of whatever description, railroad bridges, railroad stations and terminals, wharves, docks, piers, shipbuilding yards, canals, canal locks, steamships, all other ships and vessels, automobiles, trucks, wagons, or any other means of transportation whatsoever whereon or whereby such war material or any troops of the United States are being or intended to be transported either within the limits of the United States or upon the high seas, and all dams, reservoirs, aqueducts water and gas mains, and pipes, structures, and buildings, whereby or in connection with which water or gas is being or intended to be furnished to the United States, and all electric light and power, telephone and telegraph plants, poles, wires, and fixtures, and wireless stations, and the buildings connected with the maintenance and operation thereof used or intended to be used to supply light, power, or facilities of communication to the United States.

The words "United States" shall include all territory and waters subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

SEC. 2. That whoever in the United States, during time of war, shall willfully injure or destroy by fire, or by use of explosives, or by other violent means, or shall attempt so to injure or destroy any war material, war premises, or any war utilities, as herein defined, or any building or other property of the United States, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 30 years, or both.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, the reading of the bill is about the best explanation that can be made of it.

The last section, section 2, provides:

That whoever in the United States, during time of war, shall willfully injure or destroy by fire, or by use of explosives, or by other violent means, or shall attempt to injure or destroy any war material, war premises, or any war utilities, as herein defined, or any building, or other property of the United States, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than 30 years, or both.

As the House knows, there has been a great deal of lawlessness in this country during the last two years. This bill is aimed to help to put the forces of the United States in conjunction with the State authorities in preventing damage and injury to facilities which are incidental to and important to our national defense. It only exists during this war. As the report says, most of these offenses described in the bill are already covered by State laws. But acts that are aimed so peculiarly at the success of our armed forces ought to be covered in time of war by Federal law also. And that is practically all there is to this bill. The Senate passed it unanimously.

Mr. MANN. I ask for recognition in opposition to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for an hour.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to do almost anything necessary, willing to do anything that is necessary, in the conduct of the war. But this bill now presented to the House is a most remarkable piece of suggested legislation ever in the history of the world presented to a legislative assembly in a free country. What does it propose to do?

In general terms it proposes to confer upon the United States courts jurisdiction over all crimes which may be committed in the United States anywhere, and practically to deprive the State courts of jurisdiction, though they would still retain concurrent jurisdiction over the same crimes.

We have the Federal Government and the State governments. The jurisdiction of the Federal Government over crime is a closely confined jurisdiction. The State courts and the States have jurisdiction over most crimes which are committed. But under the guise of protecting war materials it is proposed by this bill to confer upon the Federal Government jurisdiction over everything.

What does it say? It provides in section 2 for a penalty of $10,000 fine or 30 years' imprisonment upon anyone who shall attempt to injure or destroy by the use of explosives or other violent means—that covers nearly everything—attempts to injure or destroy any war material, war premises, or any war utilities.

That looks well—war materials, war premises, or war utilities. But the bill contains the definition of these terms. What are war materials? War materials include arms, armament, ammunition, clothing, food, supplies, stores, and all other articles of whatever description requisite to the conduct of war by the United States, as well as war machinery and other articles and accessories connected with the production and manufacture of such war materials.

Why, that covers everything that we make, raise, or produce. It includes the farmer, the miner, the manufacturer. I do not know that they use lawyers in connection with the Army, but it includes doctors and all their materials.

Mr. SANFORD. Well, it might.

Mr. MANN. Some gentleman says it might.

Mr. MAYS. Preachers, too.

Mr. MANN. Well, it does. They are all requisite to the conduct of war. That is the intention of the bill. Then it describes war utilities. War utilities include all railroads, electric lines, roads of whatever description, pikes, improved roads, roads that are not improved, railroad bridges, railroad stations, all terminals, wharves, docks, piers, shipbuilding yards, canals, canal locks, steamships, all other ships and vessels, all automobile trucks, wagons, or other means of transportation whatsoever whereby or whereon such war materials are being transported or intended to be transported within the limits of the United States, and all dams, reservoirs, and aqueducts. Well, that is in reference to electric lights and power plants. Those are where they are furnishing power to the United States. That is legitimate. But the other description of war materials makes them include everything that can transport any of the war materials which have been defined, and as including everything that may be used in connection with an army. That includes all means of transportation. There is nothing left where the State would have sole jurisdiction.

Now, I know there may be cases—there are always particular cases—that may be pointed out where it is desirable to have somebody punished, where the person has not been punished. If all criminal codes, all penal statutes, were based upon the idea of inevitably punishing everybody who had committed a crime, no person would ever have a chance to be found not guilty. We pay some attention to the rights of citizens. Now, what is the need of turning over this jurisdiction to the Federal Government? What is the need of having the Department of Justice engaged with thousands of prosecutions, filling every Federal court with criminal cases?

The railroad companies have for years been endeavoring to get Congress to claim jurisdiction over all crimes connected with railroad property, claiming that inasmuch as they are instrumentalities of interstate commerce we have jurisdiction, and to oust the State courts of jurisdiction in this respect. Of course, this bill does not oust the State courts, because a man who commits a crime under this bill can be punished by the Federal Government, sent to the penitentiary for 30 years, and after he comes out can be punished by the State and sentenced for another 30 years if the State statute provides for it. It is the same act, but there are two offenses—one against the United States and one against the State.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. If the defendant has been put in jeopardy and had a trial for one of these offenses, the State could not prosecute again or the Federal Government would not?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says they would not.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I was about to ask my learned friend from Chicago.

Mr. MANN. Would they not?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is not the plea of former jeopardy sufficient?

Mr. MANN. There are two crimes. The act is the same. A man can not be put in jeopardy twice for the same crime, but we can declare a thing a crime which the State had declared a crime, and then there are two crimes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. There is but one performance, and it is but one crime.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is not a matter open to controversy. It has been decided repeatedly between the Federal and State courts. That is not a matter of controversy. There are two crimes. Now, do we want to say that all of these people shall be subject to prosecution in the Federal courts? Do we want to start in and raise a police force to guard all the automobiles in the country? Under this provision, if a man steals an automobile—the Lord knows I hope they will not steal any of yours—he can be brought into a Federal court. While I do not suppose they would send him to the penitentiary for 30 years or fine him $10,000, they could. Why should we, on the part of the Federal Government, attempt to police all of these different things throughout the United States?

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. Speaking of automobiles, that would not apply to private automobiles?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. KEARNS. It says an automobile that is going to be used in the transportation of troops or war materials, or intended to be.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. But a private automobile is not intended to be in it.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether it would be intended to be in it or not. There will be many of them that will be.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I concur very much in the sentiment the gentleman is expressing; but I call his attention to the fact that he is somewhat inaccurate in saying that one who steals an automobile becomes subject to the penalties of this act. It really is not as broad as that.

Mr. MANN. Possibly not. He would have to injure the automobile. Of course, if he injured it after he stole it, why then he would be subject to the penalty.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Suppose a man should set fire to his own smokehouse and consume some meat. Would he be liable to be dragged off to the Federal court and punished?

Mr. CARLIN. He would be liable to be dragged off to a lunatic asylum. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. Or suppose he should set fire to his storehouse containing food or provisions.

Mr. MANN. Of course he would be subject to the penalty. That is what this bill is for.

Mr. BUTLER. It seems to me that is going some.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TOWNER. It is not limited to war material, because in the third line on the third page it says:

> Or any building or other property of the United States.

That is, if anyone shall willfully injure, by violent means, any building of the United States. If a boy should throw a stone through the window of any Government post office, warehouse, or other Government building in the United States, would not that be within the terms of this bill?

Mr. MANN. Oh, undoubtedly.

Mr. TOWNER. And subject him to the penalty of $10,000 fine or 30 years' imprisonment.

Mr. MANN. Well, of course, he is subject to a penalty now if he destroys or injures Government property.

Mr. TOWNER. Hardly to 30 years' imprisonment.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not think they will ever give 30 years' imprisonment to a boy, not even if he lived that long. But I can not understand the purpose of bringing before this House a proposition like this, which passed the Senate unanimously and was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously. I suppose the second section probably was carefully considered——

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. In just a moment. I would not have any objection to having a penal provision of the United States imposed against anyone who destroys actual war material or war premises or war utilities of the United States. If our Government has purchased war materials, I think we ought to protect them; but that is not this bill. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In the gentleman's judgment, what is meant by lines 22 and 23, on page 2:

> The words "United States" shall include all territory and waters subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

Is it intended by that language to restrict the scope and effect of this bill to Territories and Government reservations, or the District of Columbia, or navigable rivers and waters of the United States, or does it simply mean all the territory in the United States and its island possessions? Is not that a limitation?

Mr. MANN. It means all the territory in the United States and its island possessions, and the waters surrounding them, and the ships of the United States, wherever they may be at sea.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. This could not be construed, then, as a limitation of the jurisdiction of our Federal courts, in the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; no limitation at all. It is intended as an extension.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. In view of the question asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], I should like to ask the gentleman's opinion of the meaning of the words:

Of whatever description requisite to.

Could those words possibly be interpreted to include such a case as the gentleman has mentioned, namely, if a man had on his own premises a quantity of hay or oats or meat, and destroyed them, would he be amenable to this law?

Mr. MANN. While I will not undertake to say how the courts will construe it, if the act does not mean that it means nothing.

Mr. BUTLER. It says:

Food * * * requisite to, or intended to be used in connection with, the conduct of war.

Mr. MANN. Unless it refers to the description of materials by character as requisite to that purpose it means nothing.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think that language is very peculiar and open to doubt. I looked in the dictionary this morning, and found that the word "requisite" has a variety of meanings. Of course, we all know what it commonly means, but I notice in the dictionary it repeatedly uses the word "indispensable," as synonymous. Of course, in that event it would not——

Mr. MANN. It would be very easy to draw this bill so that it would only cover injury to property which the United States had acquired. If that were the purpose, that would have been easy. But that is not the purpose. It refers to the character of property which is requisite to or intended to be used in connection with the conduct of war by the United States. Now, if it refers to the character of the property, it includes all food supplies and all other supplies, clothing and everything that goes to make up those supplies. I will ask the gentleman from Ohio if that is what he is trying to cover by this bill?

Mr. GARD. When the gentleman concludes I shall be glad to make a statement in regard to that.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I have a common purpose with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in seeking to make this bill as perfect as we possibly can, even under the circumstances of exigency under which the bill is reported.

Some of the illustrations which the gentleman has used are pertinent, but I think they are a little bit extended. While it seems to me the bill is very broad, I think it does not go to the extreme limit set by the gentleman from Illinois. In other words, I think the restriction of war material and war premises and war utilities means that the material, premises, and utilities are used in connection with the conduct of the war of the United States.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Also "requisite to."

Mr. GARD. We can not reasonably presume that the words "clothing, food, supplies, stores" include all clothing, food, supplies, or stores in the United States, but only such clothing, food, supplies, and stores as are used in the conduct of the war by the United States. The same explanation I make for the "war premises" described in line 10, and in lines 1, 2, and 3 on page 2. It is apparent that both these definitions mean that the war materials and war premises alike mean materials and premises that are used in the conduct of the war. The other word "utilities" the gentleman has given a very broad meaning to and makes the illustration that one might steal an automobile and be liable under this law. Of course, this law does not deal with larceny. I make the broader explanation that the words "war utilities" in this bill means such facilities for troops of the United States as are being transported either within the limits of the United States or upon the high seas. In other words, it means that the utility used in war and for the purpose of a war as controlled by this bill. The qualifying words are again used with reference to dams, reservoirs, aqueducts, water, and gas mains; that these are used where the water and gas are intended to be furnished to the United States and also with reference to electric light and power.

These are utilities of the United States, all with the denominating and controlling idea, as I read the bill, that the material, premises, and utilities are used in the conduct of the war. I know that we all subscribe our best efforts at all times to the successful and speedy conclusion of this war. It seems to me the object of the bill is to assemble under the Federal control, subject to punishment in a Federal court, a number of things which are here designated as war materials, war premises, and as war utilities. In order that that may be thoroughly understood, it seems to me that this part of the bill in question should have an amendment, and the amendment I would suggest is that, after the word "defined," in line 3, on page 3, the words "under the control of the United States" should be inserted, so that section 2 would read:

SEC. 2. That whoever in the United States, during time of war, shall willfully injure or destroy by fire, or by use of explosives, or by other violent means, or shall attempt so to injure or destroy any war material, war premises, or any war utilities, as herein defined, under the control of the United States—

And so forth.

Mr. LENROOT. With that limitation, what would the definition of war purposes mean with reference to railroads and electric lines?

Mr. GARD. Such as might be under the control of the United States for transportation of troops in time of war.

Mr. LENROOT. But they are not under the control of the United States.

Mr. GARD. They are not now, but may be in time of war. This bill has no application except during the time of war.

Mr. LENROOT. Would not that change the whole purpose of the bill as reported?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is it not intended to protect steel mills, munition factories owned by private corporations, their products being intended for war use?

Mr. GARD. While munitions are being manufactured for the United States.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Precisely. The gentleman's amendment, as I understood him, would seek to put this property all within the control of the United States, and they might not be under the control of the United States. They might be private property, but all of great importance to the Government. May I ask the gentleman to discuss the use of the word "requisite," which he has not discussed, which is found in line 5, page 1.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it is possible, and neither do I think it is desirable, to try to finish the bill to-night. Why not let it go over and allow Members of the House who have not examined the bill a chance to do so.

Mr. GARD. I have not the bill in charge, and would therefore ask that you make this request of the gentleman from North Carolina, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will move to adjourn and let this bill go over. I am sure that some Members of the House will want to study it.

Mr. WEBB. I hope if we do that that by the time we meet again the gentleman from Illinois will be inclined to support the bill.

Mr. MANN. I hope so, and if the gentleman from North Carolina studies the bill, I think he will be in favor of my interpretation. It ought to be made clear.

Mr. GARD. I am sure that we both will be glad of any suggestion to make the bill clear.

Mr. WEBB. I want to say that I realize that this is a very broad bill and the committee would not think of reporting it in a time of peace, but we do feel that the success of our Army and Navy and the national defense ought to have every instrumentality that it is possible to provide to insure success.

Mr. MANN. I am willing if it becomes necessary as a matter of national defense to practically appoint a dictator, but we have not reached the point yet, in the effort to establish democracy throughout the world, to absolutely abandon our own form of government. [Applause.] All I ask is to have the matter go over, so that we may have an opportunity to examine more carefully the bill.

Mr. WEBB. I am going to agree to that, but there are a number of crimes committed every day which affect the national defense, and we ought to have the power in the Government to stop them.

Mr. MANN. Let the gentleman come in and tell us what those crimes are.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman has read about them in the newspapers.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; I do not read the newspapers much, and much of what I do read I do not believe.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Only when they speak well of the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. They never do.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is the purpose of the gentleman to consider amendments when we take the bill up again, is it not?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I want to call attention to the fact that in section 2 the bill says "that whoever in the United States during a time of war." I take it that what the committee meant is that when this country is engaged in war, and that, of course, should be made clear. They do not mean that when there is war anywhere else in the world.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, there is another suggestion which I would like to have the chairman of the committee consider, and that is following the words "or any building or other property of the United States." Certainly it seems to me that should be limited by an amendment which would declare that those were used for war purposes. That could be very easily corrected.

Mr. WEBB. I do not know. The blowing up of a post office or a customhouse would be the destruction of property of the United States.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Is there not provision already for punishment for that crime?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. That has already been provided for and adequate punishment provided, but we do not want to add to the penalty 30 years of imprisonment.

Mr. WEBB. Oh, that is the maximum. They could punish a man by imprisonment for three months in jail or five minutes in jail. I am very glad, however, to have the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the gentleman's attention to line 7, on page 1, where it refers to the manufacture of war material. Why not put in the words "or its allies"?

Mr. WEBB. Strictly speaking we have not any allies as yet. Legally speaking that would not be proper.

Mr. PLATT. Well, any other words that would cover it.

Mr. GARNER. No expression so far by any bill in Congress has indicated that we have any allies, and I think it has been the impression of some that no such thing could be used.

Mr. TOWNER. But words which mean what the gentleman says could be used, without using the word "allies."

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman would not suggest that by any act of Congress we declare what the future policy should be?

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, certainly not. I am as much against any alliance as is the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PLATT. I should not like myself to use the word "allies."

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I think this bill should be clearly safeguarded from loose phraseology, or great trouble may follow. Material which potentially may be used for war seems to be synonymous with material actually used for war or intended to be used for war; that is, if material is potentially adapted to war purposes it seems to be subject to the provisions of this bill. It looks to me as if that is going pretty far. The mere adaptability of an article for war uses should not make it offensive property and subject it to the criminal procedure provided by this bill, but property or material should be either used for war or intended to be used for war before becoming amenable to the crimes provided for by this bill.

Mr. WEBB. Oh, yes; it ought to be criminal. It ought to be a crime for a man to blow up a barn of wheat; but the question of whether we should extend the laws of the United States is another thing. It ought to be a most heinous crime to destroy any property of this Government or of an individual by a bomb, by fire, or by explosive material. The question is whether we should extend the jurisdiction of the United States to punish such crimes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is in my mind—how far we are to extend the criminal jurisdiction of the United States to offenses against material not used in war and not intended to be used in war. Surely the distinction is substantive, or we will confound the penal laws of the States and those of the Nation.

Mr. SLOAN. Is it not presumed that all of the States of this Union will be vigilant in the matter of the prosecution of such crimes as the destruction of property? Every State has laws for the punishment of criminal acts.

Mr. WEBB. But the States at the present time have not got the means, have not got the secret-service men to run down these crimes as the United States Government has. That is one reason why I am willing to support the bill during war. However, I can assure the House that the committee is not wedded to the bill, and will accept any amendment which seems to clarify or perfect it.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman a question. Gentlemen have been discussing this measure in its various features. As I understand it, our Government is one of limited power, and can exercise no power not delegated to it in the Constitution. I do not believe that a single line of this bill is constitutional, except that part of the bill which provides for the protection of property which belongs to the Government of the United States. I want the gentleman to show to-morrow if he can find a section of the Constitution that delegates to the Federal Government the power to denounce as a crime within the boundary of a State such an action as that he indicated a while ago—the burning up of a barn of wheat, that may have been intended for the use of the Government of the United States, but not owned by it. You can not extend, in my judgment, the question of intention as connected with crimes committed within the boundaries of a State, so as to give the Federal Government jurisdiction in time of war or in time of peace. The Constitution is the same, we ought to recollect, in time of war as in time of peace.

Mr. WEBB. I agree with my friend.

Mr. MOON. You can not pass any law, in my judgment, that will encroach upon the jurisdiction and rights of the States by conferring by this Congress a power on the courts that the Constitution itself does not give. This bill is in no way connected with any section of the Constitution, in my judgment, that makes it valid, except as to property that belongs to or is under the control of the United States. We must not usurp power. Let us amend this bill so as to protect our interests. We can do so as far as the Constitution permits, and that is far enough.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 19 minutes) the House adjourned to meet at 12 o'clock noon to-morrow, Thursday, April 19, 1917.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 19, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we open this session of our National Senate in Thy name. We desire no other glory than that which will promote the glory of Thy name. We know no blessing except that which can be freely given to us out of Thy hand as an expression of Thy love and in conformity to the great plans that Thou hast for us as a Nation. Breathe upon us this day. Give to us the God-fearing spirit and the purpose of heart and mind to fulfill Thy perfect will. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

IMPORTATION OF PRISON-MADE GOODS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting reports from the consuls at Cork, Ireland; Tsingtau, Canton, Foochow, Amoy, and Harbin, China; and Vladivostok, Siberia, relative to the extent to which prisoners, paupers, or detained persons are utilized in the production or manufacture of the commerce of various countries, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 2893) to amend section 10 of chapter 2 of the Criminal Code, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MYERS. I present several petitions from chambers of commerce and others in Montana in favor of conscript military service. I ask that they be published in the RECORD with the signatures.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator if they are telegrams sent to him from individuals?

Mr. MYERS. They are in the nature of petitions to the Senate. I will state to the Senator that I have been receiving quite a number of such communications, and I have published very few. I intend to discontinue it. I thought it proper to publish a few and let it be known that I did not intend to keep it up in extenso. I never have done so.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall object to printing in the RECORD any more telegrams sent to Senators from private individuals or expressions of opinion that may come from private sources. I think we have allowed the RECORD to be encumbered with such matter long enough, and I know, unless we take a stand on this question, some Senators will be criticized for not having placed in the RECORD thousands of telegrams they get; but if it is understood that it is the policy of the Senate not to print them, then no one can object.

Mr. MYERS. I realize that. I have presented only a small percentage of those I have received.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will have them referred to the appropriate committees.

Mr. MYERS. I understand the Senator does not object to these.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I object, Mr. President.

Mr. MYERS. I will tell the Senator that I do not intend to pursue the policy any further. Some of these are of such a character that I think they should be published.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this is about the hundredth time I have heard this same thing in the Senate. It is never carried out. If I have a telegram that I think is important in the nature of a petition, I shall ask to have it go in the RECORD; and if that is not agreed to, I shall endeavor to get it there by reading it. I think it is futile at this late day to undertake to enforce a rule or a practice that has not been enforced up to the present time. I think the Senator from Montana has a right to have the telegrams put in the RECORD, and I hope no objection will be made.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no other motive than to call a halt, if possible, to a practice that I do not believe ought to be further followed.

Mr. MYERS. I will say to the Senator that if he will withdraw his objection, I will call a halt on myself after this.

Mr. GALLINGER. John Quincy Adams settled the matter that citizens have a perfect right to petition the Congress of the United States, and that is all that this is.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not understand that these telegrams are petitions to Congress. They are telegrams that are sent to the Senator expressing the views of the sender. I think they ought to go to the proper committee.

Mr. MYERS. I understand there is no objection to the reception of the telegrams and printing them in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT Let us settle this question, because we might as well settle it first as last.

Mr. SMOOT. I think so

Mr. MYERS. I understand the Senator from Utah withdraws his objection. If there is no objection made, there is no question before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There are three of these that beyond question or doubt are petitions to the Congress of the United States for selective conscription. There is no doubt about the right to put those in the RECORD, because they come clearly within the proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. If they are addressed to Congress, I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The fourth one the Chair will submit to the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. If there is any dispute about it, I withdraw the request for the fourth one. I only presented these telegrams because it has been the custom.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The fourth is not a petition. Three are petitions, and they will go in the RECORD. The fourth will be returned to the Senator.

The telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BUTTE, MONT., April 17, 1917.

Hon. HENRY L. MYERS,
Washington, D. C.:

At a regular meeting of the chamber of commerce last night your published indorsement of the President's war plans was commended unanimously. Resolutions were unanimously adopted favoring universal military service and immediate conscription, if deemed necessary by the President and the War College.

BUTTE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
CHAS. AUSTIN, Secretary.

POPLAR, MONT., April 18, 1917.

Senator HENRY L. MYERS,
Washington, D. C.:

We urge your support of all measures advocated by the President during the present crisis. This community stands solidly behind him. We especially call your attention to the large tracts of coal lands on the Fort Peck Reservation awaiting cultivation. Hundreds of settlers are waiting for steps to be taken that will open this land to homestead entry. Our organization indorses selective conscription.

POPLAR CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

MILES CITY, MONT., April 18, 1917.

Hon. HENRY L. MYERS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Montana Stock Growers' Association by unanimous vote indorses the principle of universal military service by conscription, and while we believe the opportunity should be given for those who wish to enlist as volunteers, either as individuals or in volunteer organizations, this association requests our Representatives in Congress to support conscription and universal military service.

D. W. RAYMOND.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am in receipt of a telegram from the mayor of Charleston, S. C., my home city, in reference to the conscription plan. I will have it censored and see whether it can properly go in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair takes pleasure in doing that. [After examining it.] There is no doubt about its being a petition.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHARLESTON, S. C., April 18, 1917.

Hon. E. D. SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

At a meeting to-night of the permanent committee formed by Mayor Hyde to advise with him on all matters concerning this city's relations to the war situation, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this committee that the policy of selective compulsory military service, advocated by the President of the United States, should be enacted into law by Congress without delay."

Tristram T. Hyde, mayor, general chairman; James Simmons, first vice chairman; P. H. Gadsden, second vice chairman; George W. Williams, Robert Lathan, John F. Ohlandt, J. P. K. Bryan, J. S. Pinkussohn, W. H. Mixson, Thomas W. Carroll, O. J. Bond, Dr. Robert Wilson, jr., Sam Berlin, Julius M. Visanska, Louis Melchers, R. Hayne King, Andrew J. Riley, John P. Thomas, Jos. A. Volaski, B. S. McLeod, Hyman Parlstein, M. Rutledge Rivers, Leland Moore, Thomas P. Lesesne, Louis M. Shimel, Frank J. Simmons, Arthur Israel, W. S. Allan, Mourisgott J. Waties Waring, William H. Dunkin, Thomas P. Stoney, H. W. Mitchell, A. V. Snell, committee on patriotic cooperation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this whole thing is so absurd that it makes me weary. Any Senator can read those telegrams and they will go in the RECORD. I really am at a loss to know why the Senator from Utah should interpose an objection at this time. It will amount to nothing. It can not amount to anything.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair feels that the order being petitions and memorials, they have a certain definite meaning; and if an objection is raised, it is the duty of the Chair, in the first instance, to determine whether it is a petition or memorial. After the Chair has determined that question, it is then for the Senate to say, first, whether the Chair has properly ruled; and, secondly, if the Chair has properly ruled, whether the Senate will permit the printing or the reading of the document.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire——
